You may forget to be grateful to the defenders of our free institutions, but generations to come, if this nation shall have a future, will not forget Gettysburgh, the great and historic battle of the war. It will become a Mecca for the lovers of liberty from all lands. Depend upon it, time at last sets all things even. The people will and do remember Appomattox Court-House and General Grant. Men may try to defame General Grant and call him tyrant and butcher, but when the prejudice and passion of the day shall be dissipated he will be remembered as General Ulysses S. Grant, the great soldier of the rebellion. His name will be honored in verse and in song, in bronze and marble, and will go down the stream of time as one of the great men of his age. U. S. Grant, the General of the United States Army, and U. S. Grant, President of the United States, will find his right place in history, and his name will be honored and revered when his traducers and calumniators will be unknown and the world will have forgotten they ever lived. Gentlemen need not be alarmed either about the fame of Phil. Sheridan or where he will rank among the great soldiers of his country. I doubt not the time will come when it will be universally recognized that he rendered good service in New Orleans, and that he was and is fit to breathe the air of a freeman.

Sheridan is roundly abused for using the word "banditti" in his New Orleans dispatch. Perhaps it was wrong for him to use this word in speaking of men who were and had been defying the United States laws and authority even to the shedding of blood and the destruction of life; but then he had ancient precedents, and he had a right to suppose that Washington's example would not be reprobated. In this, however, he was mistaken. Some men are losing their reverence for Washington and all respect for him as military authority.

President Washington's proclamation, dated August 7, 1794, in regard to the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania, uses the following language:

> By circulating vindictive measures against all who should otherwise, directly or indirectly, aid in the execution of the said laws, or who, yielding to the dictates of conscience and to a sense of obligation, should themselves comply therewith by actually injuring and destroying the property of persons who were understood to have so complied; by inflicting cruel, humiliating punishments upon private citizens for no other cause than that of appearing to be the friends of the law; by interrupting the public officers on the highways, abusing, assaulting, and otherwise ill-treating them; by going to their houses in the night, gaining admittance by force, taking away their papers, and committing other outrages, employing for these unwarrantable purposes the agency of armed banditti disguised in such a manner as for the most part to escape discovery.

Men call Sheridan hard names who would be ashamed to have him suspect them of having done so if they were to meet him face to face. The opposition may hold their carnival now and for the moment put down the soldiers of the Republic; but they mistake the people if they think that all the reminiscences of the war shall be remembered no more. You cannot get up oblivion enough to have Libby prison and Andersonville find no place in the annals of the rebellion. The power of this Government may be used to oppress negroes and to make their condition even worse and more intolerable than it was in slavery times, and to make null and void the amendments to the Constitution which were intended to secure to them absolutely the rights of free-born American citizens; the power of the Government may be employed (and in many places State authorities sanction it now) to drive negroes out of courts and outrage justice, equity, and mercy; but think not that God in heaven will hide such iniquities and will not avenge them. The blood of negroes which the plantations and swamps have swallowed up will yet become the seed of retribution. As no sparrow falleth to the ground without the notice of the heavenly Father and as the very hairs of our heads even are numbered, so surely will God treasure up the wrongs inflicted and imposed upon the negroes for their vindication and justification.

The negro was a slave; he was and is poor, illiterate, docile, and subservient. The issues of the war made him free. He became the owner of his own manhood, the lawful custodian of his own wife and children, and entitled to the fruits of his own labor. The war did not make him a citizen however, did not panoply him with the dignity, power, and glory of an American citizen; but the republican party did do it in the face of unremitting, fierce, and terrible opposition from the democratic party and from weak and doubtful republicans. It is a historic fact that the democratic party at no time yielded its opposition to the complete enfranchisement of the negro, and to-day it is a matter of no concealment with this party that it is not reconciled to his political equality. The democratic party accepted the situation on the subject from necessity and not choice. Would the citizenship of the negro be secure with the democratic party if it had the power to take it away? This is a serious question. To us on this side of the House—to the republicans belong the responsibility and honor of elevating a chattel to a freeman—a slave to citizenship.

It was an achievement that won the admiration of the civilized world, and marked one of the greatest epochs in the world's history. It was the greatest and sublimest stride that has ever been taken by a nation. When the war was over, we proudly pointed to this as next to the greatest trophy of all. The salvation of the nation was the first, and grateful hearts breathed thanks to God that the Union was saved, one and inseparable, and that a slave no longer trod the American continent; and on the background of the great picture, amid the carnage and battle scenes that the war had made, were four millions of Africa's sons and daughters, and we said to them, "You are slaves no longer; the year of jubilee has come, and with it your ransom. Abraham Lincoln, the man whom Providence has raised up to be your deliverer, has sanctified his devotion to your freedom with his blood."

I have said the republicans made the negro a citizen, and to protect him in the enjoyment of his rights we enlarged the Magna Charta of liberty by adding thereto the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. The negro in theory is a citizen, but practically in many places he is not; he is hindered and obstructed in the full and free exercise of the enjoyment of the franchise.

Let the following testimony go into history as some of the means used to intimidate republican voters:

PRIMUS MCGEE (colored) sworn.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. State your age and residence.
Answer. I am thirty-one years old. I live in Sumter County, three miles from Carrollton; was bred and born there.
Q. You used to be pretty active in politics?
A. Yes, sir; I used to distribute out tickets.
Q. You were one of the leading men down there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you this year?
A. No, sir.
Q. Were you there this year?
A. Yes, sir; I did not take any part, because they worked on me because I took a part before, and I was afraid to take part in it this year. They said they would take my seeds from me.
Q. Did they take one stone from you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You would rather hold on to that than to take part in politics?
A. Yes, sir; without more protection than I have had.
Q. You have not taken an active part in politics since then?
A. No, sir; only voting.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. You have distributed no tickets?
A. No, sir.
Q. They castrated you because you distributed tickets?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you go before a United States commissioner to complain against them?
A. No, sir.
Q. What was done with them?
A. Nothing was done against them.
Q. Did you ever inform on them?
A. No, sir; I did not know how to start about it; our people had such a poor way.
Q. Was the judge of probate a republican?
A. The judge is republican, but he was just as much a democrat as he was a republican, and the black man had no show at all.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. Did not somebody come to you about a year ago and ask if you remembered what they told you?
A. Yes, sir; they were talking to me about a year ago, and asked how my Ku-Klux was getting along.
Q. Was this done in the presence of your wife?
A. In the presence of my wife and my mother; it was done at night, between midnight and day.
Q. Did they take you out of bed?
A. Four of them stood with pistols right at my head; I do not know who they were; they were all disguised. I knew four of them; I could see under the false faces they had on; there was about thirty of them.
Q. About what time was it?
A. It was in August; I do not remember what year; it was four years ago last August.
Q. Did you suffer much?
A. Yes, sir; I suffered about three months.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Question. Why did you not leave the country?
Answer. I bought land there, me and my father-in-law together, and he is old.
Q. How much land have you?
A. Two hundred and forty acres.

JAMES SAMMONS, colored, sworn.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.
Answer. I will be twenty-seven the 15th of next July. I live in Pickens County. I am a regular farm hand.
Q. The colored republicans voted at Carrollton?
A. Yes, sir; and there was a heap of them didn't vote at all. They wouldn't feel safe, and they were afraid to go out. If the troops hadn't been at Carrollton, there wouldn't have been a colored vote in that county.
Q. Did they get some of the colored people to vote the democratic ticket?
A. Yes, sir; they paid some of them to do it, and gave them a big dinner.
Q. State what they did.
A. They gave some of them fine suits of clothes, and some meat, tobacco, and whisky, and one thing or another to get them to vote.
Q. Did they give any of them money?
A. Yes, sir; they paid some of them money, four and five dollars to vote; that is just the way they carried it out; and then they voted in Bridgeville the way they wanted them to vote; there was no fuss there.
Q. State what the condition of these men is, whether it is safe for them in that neighborhood who voted the republican ticket since the troops have been withdrawn.
[Mr. BUCKNER objects to the question.]
A. I know myself, and I can prove it, that I haven't slept in my house three night since the election, and it is pretty much that way all through that country; and these that do sleep in the house have got fall doors.
Q. Where do you and other colored men sleep at nights?
A. We dodge about and sleep in the fields and cotton-houses and one place and another; and when we do sleep in the house nearly every man in that section has got a plank sawed off somewhere, so that when they come to the door they can raise that up and slip outside.
Q. Is the reason why you are in this state of fear because you voted the republican ticket?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have any of the men that you know of been abused at their houses since the election?
A. Not right exactly where I live at.
Q. Do you know of any in the neighborhood, or of any reports of any in the neighborhood?
A. It isn't right exactly in that neighborhood. I couldn't state more than I have heard some men say who have been right there; they ran in there, I think, about two weeks ago, some twenty of them, up there at Spring Hill.

Mr. Speaker, have we come to this point in the history of this matter, that although we had the power to free the slave and endow him with citizenship, yet we are powerless or unwilling to protect him in the free exercise of his constitutional rights; and that in consequence of his ignorance and inexperience he may be intimidated and defrauded of his vote and we have no power to protect him, notwithstanding the fact that the Constitution expressly declares with regard to the amendments that "the Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provision of this article."

Do we confess that we recognize the truth of the wrong which prevails and is practiced toward the negro, and also the white unionist of the South, but that we are powerless to help him, and that we are willing therefore to consign him to his fate; or do we confess our unwillingness to move further in the defense and protection of the rights of outraged citizenship, and that we yield up the contest when the victory is scarcely half won?

Is this the proposition of American statesmen? Then, sir, what are your constitutional amendments worth? Of what use is a constitution that makes the promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope? Is it possible that you can find power in the Constitution to declare war, levy taxes, lay duties on imports, coin money, provide a national currency, and pass laws upon all conceivable subjects and find means to enforce them, but can find no power to protect American citizens upon American soil in the enjoyment and exercise of their constitutional rights in all sections of the country, without regard to "race, color, or previous condition of servitude?" If the reply to this is that we have the power but do not care to exercise it, then we acknowledge that we abandon the constitutional amendments in the interest of human freedom, and we acknowledge further that we consent to sacrifice the very principles we gained on the field of battle and in this legislative hall.

I warn my friends that this is not the occasion nor the hour when we should falter or hesitate in the great struggle for the common rights of man. The greatest victories and fairest fields have often been lost by cowardly retreats or faltering and hesitating counsel in moments of great and sublime emergency. To do right is always proper; to do wrong, never. Is it right to maintain constitutional liberty upon every inch of American soil whenever violated? Then let us see to it that the humblest citizen, be he white or black, may feel that back of him are a million of armed men with ready muskets and gleaming swords, if need be, to protect him, if in his person the Constitution is assailed.

Citizenship is the greatest privilege and most sacred right of the political man, and has been from the time of imperial Rome until the dawning of this Republic, and the highest function of a free government is to protect the citizen in the rights guaranteed to him in the Constitution, and if it fails in this, it fails in its highest office and proudest mission.

As a government we have assumed in the most solemn manner to guarantee to each citizen the fullest enjoyment of his rights, and we cannot long maintain the nation in its integrity and entirety if we fall short here.

Some men talk and argue as if the recent amendments were mere sentiments rather than fundamental principles of right and justice, and they are disposed to treat them more as abstractions than as representing living and vital issues. If these men are right, then the amendments are dead letters and bitter fruit in the Constitution, and they stand forth boldly as monuments of legislative folly instead of legislative wisdom, and they are but the symbols of mockery. Well may the negro say that Lincoln had better never have dipped his pen in ink to write his name to the emancipation proclamation; better the attempt had never been made to clothe him with citizenship and refuse to protect him in the free exercise of this prerogative. Well may he say, after all his sufferings and pantings for the exercise of a great right pertaining to his manhood, that as he is now enabled to enjoy it, it is after all but a snare and delusion.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we have the power under the Constitution to absolutely secure to every citizen the full and free exercise of the franchise and the equal protection of the law in every State, county, city, or hamlet of this country by "appropriate legislation." It is only a question as to how much force is necessary. Having the power, the correlative of this proposition is true, that we ought to employ it until American citizenship becomes the synonym the world over for equality under and before the law, and until the name, as did that of "Roman citizen," carries with it its own vindication when outraged upon American soil or where the American flag has a right to float.

What is "appropriate legislation?" It is fit, peculiar, suitable legislation, adapted to the case, to provide a remedy for the evil or means to secure the ends.

The bill before the House is "appropriate legislation" under the Constitution as well as necessary, and is intended to secure to the people of the South, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, all the rights which any citizen may enjoy in Maine or in any other section of the country. Most of the provisions of the bill may be enforced in all parts of the country, and the application of the law can be made whenever necessary.

The first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution is in these words:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

This section is intended to hold a State in check; and if a State by its laws should infringe upon or violate this provision of the Constitution, such State would cease to be republican in form, and the power of Congress would be plain and the duty clear to interpose the majesty and force of the General Government in behalf of the citizen whose constitutional rights were invaded by the State government.

Nobody questions the authority of the General Government over the State when laws are made or enforced which abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Take the opposite of this proposition. Suppose there are laws upon the statute-books of the State for the purpose of enforcing the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States and for the purpose of preventing any person from being deprived of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, and to secure to every person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law; but suppose the State does not enforce these provisions or suffers them to be violated in many or few instances, here the State government would be republican in form, but the guarantee of the fourteenth amendment would be violated. Now, is it contended that Congress could not by "appropriate legislation" meet this case or cases like it? If so, then you admit the right of nullification and the doctrine of State rights, and the General Government is barred from enforcing its own Constitution and laws.

Again, how stands the case if the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States without any State legislation are abridged by the action of some of the citizens thereof? Do you answer that you have power to punish the State for hostile legislation, but not the individuals who violate the Constitution of the United States without the legal sanction of the State for their acts? In other words, is it contended that the General Government has power over the State when she passes or enforces laws in violation of the constitutional amendments or laws of the United States, but not over citizens when they violate the provisions of the same? The corollary must be clear, then, that the authority of the United States is supreme over the State in case of hostile legislation against the United States and also over the individuals of a State for the infraction by them of the Constitution or laws of the United States. The only safe ground to hold and occupy upon this question is, that whenever the rights of a citizen of the United States are invaded in any State by the State or individuals thereof, it is the duty of the General Government by appropriate legislation to secure to him such rights, and to use and employ the military and naval power of the Government to enforce them when necessary. A government becomes contemptible that does not exercise all the power necessary to enforce its own laws. Force is the only weapon that a government can use against those who violate its laws, and it is time that this great question should be determined to the terror of evil-doers. Let it be understood that the laws will be enforced in all sections of the country at all hazards and without regard to cost, and that the whole power of the Government will be employed to accomplish this, and you will have peace, security, and fair elections. If, however, it is understood that the Constitution of the United States is an expanding and adjusting sort of an instrument, and that, when set at defiance in any State by formidable combinations or otherwise, and citizens are shorn, stripped, and deprived of their high prerogatives, no power or force is interposed to right the wrongs of the downtrodden or to protect them in their proper privileges, then this boasted Constitution will not always be the bond of union between States. When the rights of a citizen of the United States are assailed the United States itself is assaulted.

Let it be known that a citizen has rights under the Constitution which are guaranteed and which the Government is bound to enforce, and our institutions are safe from within at least.

The safety and perpetuity of our institutions depend more upon free and fair elections than on anything else, and in no other direction ought the strong arm of the Government to be more firmly employed and exercised. Without this the guarantee that no State "shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," amounts to but little. To deprive a citizen of the free exercise of the franchise is to take away from him "the equal protection of the laws," because if he is not permitted to enjoy this the greatest boon of citizenship he does not enjoy the equal protection of the law. If this guarantee is not sacredly maintained our free institutions cannot be continued, because "the consent of the governed," when thus outraged, will be wanting. The solution of our southern troubles resolves itself into a single question, Can they be, and are the constitutional rights of the colored people secured practically, without aid from the General Government? Has the obligation of the Government ceased simply by incorporating certain amendments in the Constitution, and is there no responsibility beyond the letter of the law; or do we not, by virtue of the constitutional amendments, assume and say to the colored people, "We will see to it that you shall without violence, fear, or intimidation enjoy these rights?" There is little that you can do for the colored people of the South except as it is accompanied by force; laws upon the statute-books, unless you provide the means to execute them, afford no relief, and the only force that I know of that can be made effective is the military arm of the Government. There is often need of the military to aid the civil officers in many places to execute their process, and it is not so shocking a proposition as some imagine. This was done in Brooklyn and Philadelphia in connection with illicit distilleries a few years ago.

It may be unpleasant and undesirable to employ the military, but how else will you give effect to the constitutional amendments or enforce the laws when resisted? The Government assumed to guarantee to the negro certain great privileges when it forced citizenship upon him, and to desert him now would be worse than Punic faith. The negro would be better as a slave than to be abandoned now; and if you give up at this point, what becomes of the boasted fruits and victories of the war? Ah, yes, you can point out your national cemeteries where are arranged in military lines the graves of the dead patriots of the war. You can say when you strew flowers on their graves that after all they have died in vain. You can point to your long pension lists that swallow up $30,000,000 annually, and say that you remember the dead soldiers. The purposes of this bill are to secure fair elections, to preserve State governments from overthrow or subversion, and to enforce the guarantees of the Constitution. The principal objection is against the last section, because it authorizes the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and this is charged as an invasion of civil liberty. Perhaps there are men who have a higher appreciation of personal liberty than I, but there are none who will go further to maintain it.

A careful reading of this bill will show that the safeguards around the provisions of this section are ample. The suspension of the writ is to be in the interest of liberty and human rights. I am told that it may be abused by the President. I admit this, and reply that the same is true of the Constitution and the laws passed under it. But are you justified in refusing to do a necessary thing because there may be an abuse in the exercise of the discretion vested in the President? The Constitution, which gives great power to the President, and which he may violate and abuse, also authorizes his impeachment; and I verily believe that any President who would oppressively use this discretion in the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus could and would be more speedily and successfully impeached than for any other high crime or misdemeanor. The very fact that such power is lodged in the President would to a great extent obviate any necessity for its use, and make the President all the more prudent and careful before taking so important a step or exercising so great a responsibility. Clothe the President with that power, and I believe you at the same time remove the exigency for its use. The fact that the power is liable to be employed at any time will exercise a conservative, restraining, and wholesome influence upon persons who might otherwise be disposed to set at defiance the laws and authorities of the United States. You have it in the Constitution that the President shall "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and in the oath of office as prescribed in the Constitution the President is required, "to the best of his ability, to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." This oath embraces all laws, treaties, and statutes.

Let me inquire whether it is just to legislate upon the presumption that the laws passed by Congress will not be fairly executed by President Grant or any subsequent President? It is an unjust aspersion upon any present or prospective official to oppose the passage of a law because there may be abuse in the execution of it at some time. If that were a sound excuse, it would be the best reason I have heard of yet for not passing any law, and I wonder this objection is not constantly interposed and heeded. Why did not the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means apply this argument to his tax bill and tell the House that there is no use in putting a tax on whisky or tobacco because somebody will abuse the law and cheat the Government? Why does the chairman of the Appropriation Committee not take his stand on this ground and sound a halt on appropriations for the reason that there may be abuse in the use of public money?

Who denies but good may come from a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus? It saved South Carolina a few years ago. Human life and liberty may be preserved thereby and the peace and good order of communities maintained. But, say some, the President may violate his oath and suspend this great writ at a time and place and under circumstances not demanded by the exigencies of the case, and therefore the power ought not to be granted to the President. That is the point and strength of the whole argument; but it is not the argument of the statesman, but rather of the special pleader begging the question. You might as well argue that a man ought not to travel on railroads because the cars may run off the track and hurt somebody. But there are two other objections; not to the principle of the section itself, but to the time and extent of its operation.

First, it is urged that there ought to be a limit as to the time in which the President should exercise this power. The difficulty about fixing a limit as to time is that you do not know when the necessity for it will cease; I would not limit it to the present Executive, because I have confidence that the successor to the present Chief Executive will not abuse the powers granted in this section. I am willing to trust the next President, be he republican or democrat; besides, if experience demonstrates that the use of this power works oppression, wrong, and injustice, Congress can repeal or alter it. I would not by a limit of time seem to reflect upon the President to be inaugurated in March, 1877. I would not limit the operation of the law to one or two States, because the powers that are intrusted to the discretion of the President it may be necessary to use in a State or Territory not thought of now. The true thing to do is to make the law general. I do not want to say that it is to be used in one section of the country alone, because to name the States would be almost directory as to those States. I want the President to have power to use it in any State or part of a State in this Union when necessary, and I hope that the time may never come when it will be necessary for the President to exercise the power conferred upon him by this section.

It ought to be borne in mind that since the war we are legislating under altered circumstances, which compelled changes in the Constitution and which require new and appropriate legislation that could scarcely be anticipated before. By the constitutional amendments four millions of human beings were guaranteed liberty to themselves and posterity forever. It should not be forgotten that the fourteenth amendment did not receive a single democratic vote in either House of Congress, and that in consequence our own obligations are multiplied. The constitutional amendments became party measures and now it becomes the most serious question of the day whether this Congress will follow up by appropriate legislation the work commenced and inaugurated by the Fortieth Congress, even to a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. It may be necessary to do this very thing to secure liberty in the South. Is this a time to hesitate and forget a just duty?

The changes which have been and are still being made in our social and political affairs demand corresponding changes in the laws of the land.

That Congress has the power to pass this bill I believe is conceded. The real question is as to the necessity; and with a view of throwing some light upon this point as to Alabama I introduce the following testimony:

First Lieutenant Thomas McDougall, Seventh Cavalry United States Army, stationed at Greensborough on election day:

Question. From what you learned of the condition of the community, in your judgment was the presence of the soldiers there calculated to prevent difficulties between the people?

Answer. I think so.

Q. Is it your opinion that if you had not been there with your troops there would have been trouble about politics and the election?

A. Yes, sir; there would have been a difficulty if the troops had not been there, from what I could understand of the condition of the parties.

Q. If anything was said to you by democratic politicians in regard to their purpose about the negroes voting, please state it.

A. I can only state casual conversations with different parties, whose names I cannot give. They said the least word from those negroes would bring on a difficulty on both sides, and that they were tired of being subjected to a rule of that kind.

Q. What was said to you, if anything, by democrats after the election, as to what would have occurred if you had not been here?

A. If I had not been here, that the crack of a whip would have brought on a serious difficulty among the negroes and themselves on the day of election.

Q. During your stay in that community, what was the conduct of the negroes?

A. They appeared to be very quiet, and there was no trouble at all.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. What was the conduct of the whites during your stay there?

A. Very quiet also, except they were quite bitter in that town against northern people generally.

G. B. RANDOLPH sworn and examined:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State what was the tone of the democratic press, including the Mobile Register and other papers in the State, toward you for making these arrests under the process of the United States courts, as you were bound to do?

Answer. It was as abusive as it could be. They have abused me; called me deputy handcuffer, and everything.

Q. These abuses and these epithets have been heaped upon you before even an examination of the prisoner?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. As I understand, you were an officer executing the process of the courts?

A. Yes, sir. I had warrants for the arrest of these parties three or four weeks before I arrested them.

Q. Have you ever been in Pickens County?

A. I was there last week.

Q. What state of feeling did you find there?

A. I found the negroes, as a class, were intimidated, and were in as bad a condition as they possibly could be. I think they are in a worse condition, and they say so themselves, than they were in slavery.

Q. Is this intimidation on account of politics?

A. Yes, sir. They begged of me, thinking I had some influence, to get the Government to buy land and locate them somewhere, saying they would be willing to work for the Government for their victuals and clothing, and give up all the profits of their earnings.

Q. What is the truth as to the negroes in these counties of which you have knowledge and of which you have spoken as to their chances for justice in the State courts?

A. There is no justice in the State courts for the negro in those counties, and no relief or protection for them, in my opinion.

Q. Why is this so?

A. It is on account of the prejudice of the democrats against the colored man's politics. I made a trip lately through Tuscaloosa County after some illicit distillers, and met negroes there in as bad a condition as they were in Pickens County. I had one old man as a guide. He told me that he had bought a tract of land and made part payment on it, asking my advice about taking it all. He said he had paid a thousand dollars, and then said to me, "I have understood that we are going to have democratic rulers and that the democrats are to be in power." He wanted to know if it would be safe for him to stay. I told him yes. He seemed to be afraid of being taken into slavery again. I asked him if he had voted. He said no. I asked him why. He said that a committee of white men waited on him and all the other negroes around his section and told them that they could not vote if they did not vote the democratic ticket.

Q. Then, from your knowledge of these counties of which you have spoken, you are satisfied that there is no protection either to life or property for this class of men?

A. Yes, sir; I am satisfied that no republican can obtain justice in any of those counties of which I have spoken, unless, perhaps, it is Marengo County.

JAMES BROWN, sworn and examined.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. Judge Buckner has asked you what you heard about reports. Did you not hear that colored people were whipped and driven from their homes, so that they had to go out in the swamps and woods because they were republicans?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. What people did you hear that went into the swamps?

A. There is old Jim Tweedy. He lived on our place. He was carried out from his house one night and tied up to a tree and whipped.

Q. Who did he say did it?

A. He said the white people in his neighborhood did it.

Q. What was he whipped for?

A. I do not know.

Q. Do you know of anybody else?

A. There is John Lee.

Q. What was done to John Lee?

A. He was shot all to pieces.

Q. Do you know of people going out in the woods and swamps about the time they rode around there after Bob Reed?

A. There is Bob Johnson, a colored man, had to leave his own place and lay out in the woods.

Q. The white people say that they will kill the colored people?

A. Yes, sir; they say so, and they say it big, too.

Q. Are the black people whipped and driven from their homes or shot, that you know of?

A. There is a heap about through the country that I don't know the names of.

Q. Do the white people whip and drive into the woods the black democrats?

A. No, sir; they don't whip them. I never heard tell of one of them being whipped.

Q. All these men you know of who have been whipped and punished are colored republicans?

A. Yes, sir.

ARTHUR BINGHAM, late treasurer of Alabama, and editor of State Journal, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Have you any knowledge, direct or indirect, of an organization called the White League?

Answer. None whatever except what I have seen published. I published their constitution, which was furnished to me by one man who said that he had once belonged to them.

Q. Has that man made his name public?

A. I did have his name, but what I have done with the memorandum I do not know.

Q. How long since did you publish it?

A. I think in August. I believe it was immediately after the killing of Mr. Billings, which occurred on the 2d day of August.

Q. Have you any reason to believe that there is such an organization in existence now?

A. I have.

Q. Can you give us an idea of the numbers and purposes of their organization as set forth in the constitution as published?

A. As published, they are sworn, where any of them get into trouble, not to regard their obligation in courts; to clear one another by all means; and are sworn against the black race.

* * * * * * *

Q. The governor's guards of Talladega were organized under the laws of the State?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How do you know that republicans in that organization were asked to leave?

A. I know because one of my own family was a member?

Q. Did he leave?

A. He did.

Q. Were there not white republicans enough in that part of the State to form an organization?

A. No, sir.

M. C. OSBORNE, a prominent citizen of Mobile.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. How long have you lived here?

Answer. I am a native of Ohio, and I have lived here since 1865.

Q. How long do you expect you will have to live here before you will cease to be called a carpet-bagger?

A. I do not know. I have been here nine years, and they still call me a carpet-bagger.

Q. Do you not think you will be called a carpet-bagger by them as long as you vote the republican ticket?

A. I do, indeed.

Q. State whether it is possible in this State to have a free and fair election without the presence of United States troops.

A. It is not.

Q. State whether it is possible to maintain republican government in this State without the presence of the United States Army.

A. I think not.

Q. What are your reasons?

A. Just such work as was done here on the day of election, and such as I know has been done through the country.

JAMES GILLETTE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your name.
Answer. My name is James Gillette.
Q. What official position did you occupy during the election?
A. I was United States commissioner and chief supervisor, under the act of Congress of 1871. I acted in that capacity.

* * * * * * *

Q. You are satisfied that no State government can be maintained here without the aid of the United States Government?
A. I do not say that.
Q. Do you mean to say that a State government can be maintained?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do I understand you to say that you are satisfied no fair election can be held in the State without the aid of United States troops?
A. No, sir; not without the intervention of United States authorities.
Q. Do you not know that the very fact that the United States authorities interfere with the local elections in the State of Alabama has been the means of creating excitement and prejudice in the minds of Alabamians?
A. I think that the prejudice and excitement would be much greater without the protection given by the General Government.
Q. Do you mean to say that the people are not qualified to govern themselves?
A. I mean to say that at this particular juncture of affairs the protection of the United States authorities is necessary for good government in this country.
Q. Do you mean to say that the people of the State of Alabama are not qualified to govern and regulate their own affairs without the interference of United States authority either civil or military?
A. At the present juncture I should say that they were not.
Q. You mean to say, then, that Alabama is not possessed of intelligence sufficient to manage her own internal affairs without the intervention of the United States civil and military authorities?
A. I do not wish to say that the people of Alabama are not intelligent enough; but the Government has passed certain laws conferring the elective franchise upon a certain class of citizens, and there is a prejudice against those laws. If the Government intends that they shall be enforced, although the people are intelligent enough if they desired to enforce them, it is necessary under the present circumstances that the United States authorities should remain in the State in order that those laws shall be carried into effect.

Q. State whether a peaceable and orderly State government can be preserved in the State of Alabama, in your judgment, without the presence of United States troops, with protection to men of all ranks and classes of society.
A. In my judgment the presence of the United States authorities is necessary in order to secure good government in this country, and will be necessary for some time to come under the recent legislation of Congress increasing the number of citizens and conferring the elective franchise on the colored people. My opinion is that it is necessary that the Government should protect them in their rights until such times as those rights are generally acknowledged by all classes of people.

C. F. MOULTON, ex-mayor of Mobile, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. How many colored men were excluded from registration, as you understand?
Answer. I suppose at the seventh ward, judging from former elections, that six or eight hundred were excluded.
Q. The question came up whether the colored men have been treated fairly or not recently in this State. Within your knowledge, has a white man ever been convicted for the murder of a colored man in the State of Alabama?
A. I never heard of such a case since their freedom.
Q. Can white men carry concealed weapons and colored men carry concealed weapons upon the same terms in this country?
A. Yes, sir; it is illegal in both cases.
Q. Have there been resolutions passed by democrats to employ colored men who vote the democratic ticket in preference to republicans?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And state whether the conduct and action of the democrats and of the democratic party is not toward the protection and employment of colored men who vote their ticket.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State whether men who vote the republican ticket are not proscribed by democrats in their employment.
A. Yes, sir; that is a notorious fact.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Q. Do you know of any person having exercised such proscription?
A. Hundreds in this city.
Q. Can you give the names?
A. I do not remember names, but it is so public a matter that I could go to the newspapers and get resolutions. It is a fact that never would be denied by an intelligent gentleman of Mobile.
Q. Can you find a single white gentleman in this city who has discharged republican negroes for voting the republican ticket and employed negroes for voting the democratic ticket?
A. I have known them often to discharge men for voting the republican ticket. I do not know that they employed others in their places.

D. C. RUGG, of Mobile, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State whether or not the tone of the democratic newspapers here looked toward personal violence and intimidation.
Answer. The tone of the newspapers has been very violent; it has been so constantly, in fact, since reconstruction. For instance, I recollect one leader in the Mobile Register which particularly struck my attention. It appeared in the paper of April 25, 1874. In that article assassination was openly defended and advocated as a means of getting rid of the element in the community which was antagonistic to the democratic party.
Q. State whether the presence of soldiers in the community or anywhere in the State where you are acquainted intimidated democrats from voting according to their sentiments?
A. Not in the slightest degree.
Q. In this town did they have any effect whatever?
A. Not the slightest in either direction.
Q. State whether or not it is possible to have fair and free elections in the State of Alabama without the presence of soldiers in the State hereafter or at the present time.
A. I do not think it is possible; and I hardly think it is possible even with Federal soldiers here to-day. Certainly not.

JAMES D. WELLIFORD, sworn and examined.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Question. In your judgment, can the laws be executed in Sumter, Pickens, and Butler Counties without the aid of troops?

[Mr. BUCKNER objected to the question.]

Answer. They cannot.
Q. To attempt to do so would be dangerous to life?
A. I think so. I know it. I think I will take as much risk as any one, and I would not like to do it without assistance.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. What counties do you say the laws cannot be executed in?
A. The laws cannot be executed in Sumter, Pickens, Greene, and Covington. These are the counties I have had experience in, and I know all about them.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. What did Mr. Lindsay, a democratic member, tell you on that subject?
A. I was up there in Tallapoosa County for the purpose of serving some papers, and I met Mr. Joseph Lindsay, an ex-member of the Legislature. He says, "Are you not afraid to ride up here by yourself?" I said, "No; I am not. I don't think there is one man in a thousand would shoot another man from behind the bushes, and that is the only way I am afraid of them." He says, "You are in great danger." I said, "Why do you think so?" He said, "I heard a man say you could not live long in this community if you came up here to serve papers." But I have been back there since and have not been killed. I was resisted, though, the last time I was there to serve papers.
Q. Will you state what effect your political course has had on you socially?
[Mr. BUCKNER objects to the question for the reason that it is not within the purview of the resolution under which the committee is acting.]
A. I am ostracized without any other reason than my political opinions, because I serve the United States Government. Recently at my boarding-house I noticed one of the boarders did not speak to me after making these arrests in Eufaula; on leaving the boarding-house I remarked that Mr. Barker did not speak to me.
Q. Is Mr. Barker a democrat?
A. Yes, sir; a rabid democrat. The landlord said, "We hate to tell you, but they are all down on you for arresting white men, and I wanted to let you know it, but I hated to tell you. We consider you the most of a gentleman of anybody that ever boarded at our house, and I hate to lose you." I then went to another boarding-house, and nothing was said or done there. I have never had a direct personal insult offered me, but I could see the cold shoulder at that other house, and left it.
Q. Have you had any conversation with John Ardis, a democrat?
A. Yes, sir; while in Sumter County making arrests I had a subpœna for John Ardis and called on him between midnight and day; the old man was very much agitated. He is an old negro. I told him not to be alarmed. "Why is it you are a democrat? That is singular for a negro to be a democrat." He says, "I see the blue-coats now, and I will get protection. I have been obliged to be a democrat to save my own life."

Let us learn that progress is stamped upon everything; and that for a party in this age to halt in the march of great events is to go backward, or like an army withdrawing from the field just at the moment when victory is about lighting upon its banners. Let it be remembered that, as the hand printing-press has given way to the steam-power, the post-boy to the electric current that encircles the globe, the flint-lock musket to the breech-loading repeating rifle, the hand-loom to the mighty power-loom whose shuttles never cease, the rush and tallow candle to the brilliant gas, so old laws in the interest of human rights must yield and give place to newer and better ones and that prejudices in favor of the old must give way to the new.

This bill, however, is objected to by some one because it is to be a declaration in favor of a third term. Well, sir, the man who sees a third term in this bill has a prescience that is not often found in a human being, and certainly not in a Congressman; but certainly the man who can by any possible reasoning or construction see such a thing in this bill is justified in voting against it.

The reports of the various southern investigating committees abound with the evidences of outrage, violence, intimidation, murder, destruction of business, property, churches, and school-houses on account of men being republicans. It shows that men and families are ostracized and proscribed and driven out of business all over the South for being republicans. That many of the State governments are unstable and insecure, and would have been overthrown but for the presence of United States troops, and that some are only now maintained because of fear of the United States authorities, cannot be denied. Take from the South the few troops that are there, and you invite revolution, destruction of State governments, anarchy, usurpation, and bloodshed. I am not sounding a false alarm, nor am I unfriendly to the South. No unkind feeling pulsates in my heart toward the southern people, but I want a just and fair government for southern States that will protect all classes of citizens in their constitutional rights, and to secure them I would use the entire power of the General Government to suspension of the writ of habeas corpus when necessary.

Republicans should remember that when the party was bold and aggressive in its policy of right and justice the people trusted and sustained it; but when it commenced to apologize for wrong and hesitated in doing right, decomposition and dissolution set in; and unless we come up squarely to the protection of outraged citizens and the defense of the Constitution we cannot stop the work of disintegration that is going on, and it will be written of the party "Weighed in the balance and found wanting."

I am anxious to save the great republican party that has done so much to advance civilization and to elevate the standard of liberty. There are men to-day who think they stand at the doors of power and greatness and expect to enter in, but the hinges of those doors will never turn for them if they fail in their allegiance to the principles that have made glorious the history of the republican party. Tantalus-like they will see the fruit before them, but when they stretch out their hands for it, it will turn to ashes. Mr. Speaker, let us stand up for the principles of equality before the law, be true to the early mission of our party, and not give up the struggle until the rights of American citizens are protected and secured everywhere in this broad land, and God will be with us.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD as a portion of the debates of the House some remarks which he had prepared upon the pending bill. (See Appendix.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] a member of the committee reporting the bill, is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. SPEER. With the permission of the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] I will move that the House now take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. We had better adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have another suggestion differing slightly from either that has been made, and I would like to make it now if the gentleman from California will permit me.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am willing to yield for any suggestion, provided it does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The gentleman from California as one of the committee reporting the bill is by usage of course entitled to an hour. I understand that he has awarded some of his time to gentlemen who are too ill to be present and speak now. He does not wish to lose his right to the floor. Suppose that instead of now adjourning until to-morrow, or taking a recess until ten o'clock, the gentleman yields the floor now so as to permit other gentlemen who desire to speak, and who would not get an opportunity to do so to-morrow, to have an opportunity to address the House to-night. I understand that the other committee-men who will be entitled by usage to be recognized have awarded a portion of their time to their friends.

Mr. SPEER. If that can be done, I will withdraw my motion for a recess.

Mr. LUTTRELL. With the understanding I suppose that on to-morrow I shall be entitled to the floor, and then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a member of the committee will follow me. I have awarded a portion of my time to members not on the committee, and I presume I will be first entitled to the floor to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair responds by saying that in all probability he will not be in the chair to-morrow and cannot recognize any attempt to make an arrangement for the order of debate to-morrow?

Mr. HAYS. How much time will the gentleman from California have to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be entitled to an hour.

Mr. HAYS. How much time will be given to the other side?

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be entitled to an hour, and after that it will be for the House to determine how much more time will be allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No limit has yet been assigned by the House for this debate. The Chair thinks he can safely say that the gentleman from California will be recognized to-morrow as entitled to the floor.

Mr. CESSNA. In order that silence may not be construed as giving consent to any arrangement which gentlemen may desire to make, I wish to say on my own behalf at least, and I think on behalf of many others, that there will be an earnest effort made to-morrow to call the previous question on this bill at twelve o'clock, or at the latest at one o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. The notice distinctly given was one o'clock.

Mr. CESSNA. I know that one o'clock was named, but gentlemen on the other side refused to agree to it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If there is to be any disposition on the part of any one to object to the proposed arrangement, I beg the House to remain longer to-night for debate. I want to say something, and so do other gentlemen.

Mr. CESSNA. That is just what I want, precisely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California, as a member of the committee, will not in all probability lose his rights. The present occupant of the chair cannot say so positively of his own knowledge; but he thinks he is safe in giving the gentleman that assurance.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then if I shall not lose my rights to-morrow, I will give way now and yield the floor to other gentlemen who desire to speak.

Mr. CONGER. I object to any arrangement by consent to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not recognized any attempt at making an arrangement. The Chair has the right, however, to respond to the inquiries of gentlemen on the floor.

Mr. CONGER. In the present arrangement of the business here, contrary to the expectation, those who had arranged the plan of discussion are precluded from either any control of the bill or any opportunity to speak upon the subject; and I am authorized by several gentlemen to object to any arrangement being made to-night which shall bind us to-morrow.

The SPEAKER, (Mr. BLAINE having resumed the chair.) The Speaker has been in the House while the present discussion has been going on, and he has not heard any proposition for an arrangement. The only point is whether the gentleman from California, as a member of the committee, shall be recognized to-morrow. Does the gentleman from Michigan object to that?

Mr. CONGER. I do not propose to express any opinion in regard to the manner in which the right to take part in the debate has all been given to certain gentlemen here to-night. At the proper time I propose to do so. I have only to say to-night that I object to any arrangement which shall bind me and some others as an agreement in regard to the order of debate to-morrow.

Mr. TYNER. I cannot let this occasion pass without saying that the only gentlemen who have been recognized here to-night are gentlemen of the committee; that each gentleman has been recognized for the period of one hour only; and if the gentleman from Michigan has any objection to that, he may, if he can, find some precedent in the past upon which to base his objection.

Mr. CONGER. The manner in which this bill was prepared and the manner in which it was by chance reported—differently from almost any other bill ever presented in the House—is known to most gentlemen on our side of the House. Unexpectedly, without any arrangement at all in regard to the speaking and contrary to the arrangements which had been made, an hour each was assigned to members of the one committee who presented the joint report of several committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will please observe that only the committee that reported the bill can receive parliamentary recognition. Any outside understanding that there may have been in the preparation of the bill cannot be recognized in the House.

Mr. SPEER. That was a mere caucus arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The members of the committee reporting the bill are entitled to precedence in discussing it. Any outside arrangement that there may have been cannot of course obtrude itself on this floor.

Mr. CONGER. I have never before known an occasion when the whole of the time of a limited debate (and from the near termination of this Congress the present debate must necessarily be limited) was assigned so that no other persons than members of one committee could get the floor to be heard at all.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair does not know at all what has transpired during his absence to-night. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] was requested to preside, without the slightest limitation. But to the rule that members of the committee reporting a bill are entitled to precedence in the debate the Chair has never known an exception, unless in this respect only: that while members of the committee are in general entitled to the floor alternately, one on each side, yet if the committee unite unanimously in a report the members of that committee are not permitted to speak consecutively all on one side. If, however, there be a difference of opinion in a committee the parliamentary right, as well as the right of propriety, suggests that in the debate they shall alternate on the different sides of the question.

Mr. TYNER. And that rule has been followed to-night.

The SPEAKER. If that has been followed to-night, the proceeding has been consistent with parliamentary law and the instinctive law of justice.

Mr. CONGER. That may be "the instinctive law of justice;" but some gentlemen here have thought that in the five hours given to this debate it might be possible for others to be heard than the five gentlemen of the committee.

The SPEAKER. If the House limits the debate to five hours, it limits it to the five gentlemen who prepared the report.

Mr. CONGER. The then occupant of the chair informed me, on my inquiring whether there would be opportunity for anybody else to speak, that the list was handed to him and that the order as there given would be followed.

The SPEAKER. No list was handed to the gentleman whatever.

Mr. TYNER. The "then occupant of the chair" did not make any such statement to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman means just what he says. The "then occupant of the chair" simply said this to the gentleman from Michigan: that the Speaker had indicated to him that members of the committee should be first recognized.

The SPEAKER. Of course; nothing else could be done.

Mr. TYNER. But the Chair did not hand me a list.

The SPEAKER. Of course not.

Mr. TYNER. Nor did I say to the gentleman from Michigan that he did hand me a list, nor did I make any statement out of which he could draw such an inference.

Mr. CONGER. Nor did I say so, but that the gentleman showed me a list and I read it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated that the list was handed to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CONGER. But not by the Speaker.

Mr. TYNER. I said to the gentleman I had made that list out myself, recognizing the members of the committee first in favor of the bill and then against it.

The SPEAKER. There need not be the slightest secrecy or mistification about it. When the Chair called the gentleman from Indiana to preside he asked what was the order of debate, and the Chair replied the first recognition was of the members of the committee, and he presumed he himself would be in the Hall before the committee was exhausted, and the Chair is here.

Mr. CONGER. That is an important fact, and I recognize it to be such.

The SPEAKER. Then what is the point of the gentleman?

Mr. CONGER. But it is not a more important fact than that a dozen or fifteen or twenty or perhaps one hundred gentlemen in the five hours which is proposed for discussion cannot have a few minutes' opportunity to express their views.

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to decide whether the debate shall continue.

Mr. HAYS. The only thing I ask is that the list may be preserved and I may have an opportunity of having some time to speak.

The SPEAKER. There is no list for the gentleman from Alabama or anybody else.

Mr. CESSNA. I think in justice to myself I ought to make a suggestion in addition. I do not desire to make any reflection upon any arrangement to be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand how there can be any room for reflection, whether the gentleman has any desire to do so or not.

Mr. CESSNA. He has the right.

The SPEAKER. He has no right to make any reflection.

Mr. CESSNA. I do not make any.

The SPEAKER. He will please observe not to make any.

Mr. CESSNA. But I wish to give the notice for which I was assailed for not giving, and that is this: We spent twenty-eight hours of time in the last hours of the session, which I thought was crucifying us, to prevent the consideration of this bill, and now to save from destruction the appropriation and other important measures, I will not give further time for debate.

The SPEAKER. What parliamentary connection has the gentleman from Pennsylvania with the bill?

Mr. CESSNA. None in the world.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will take direction from the gentleman who has charge of it.

Mr. CESSNA. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to give his opinion.

The SPEAKER. As his opinion individually; but the Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Let me rise to a point of order.

Mr. HAYS. I only desire to say that I requested the gentleman who was in the Chair to put my name on the list to speak after the members of the committee had been gone through with, and he promised to do it. If there is no list, then I have nothing to say. If I cannot be recognized, then I will humbly submit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds here, which he had not observed before, a list of gentlemen who are to speak, taken by the gentleman who temporarily occupied the Chair.

Mr. HAYS. I wish to have an opportunity to speak on this question.

The SPEAKER. It will be the duty as well as the pleasure——

Mr. HAYS. To answer charges made against me.

The SPEAKER. It will be the duty as well as the pleasure of the Chair, if debate is continued, to recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I suggest, for the gratification of gentlemen who desire to speak, that if there are two hundred men who do not desire to speak, let the one hundred, if there be a hundred, or fifty, if there be only fifty, make speeches in the time which is left.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. TYNER. Lest there should be some misunderstanding, I desire to say that a number of gentlemen came to the Chair to-night asking their names might be put down on the list to give them an opportunity to speak. I distinctly said I had no right to make any arrangement in connection with it, but that I would put their names down.

The SPEAKER. Lest there might be the slightest misapprehension in regard to the way the gentleman from Indiana has discharged his duties, the Chair begs to say that he would have done precisely as that gentleman has done.

Mr. HYNES. In order that somebody may have the right to speak, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] is recognized.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minority of the committee appointed to investigate affairs in the State of Alabama has seen fit to rehash a number of the falsehoods, which the democratic press of the South published concerning my letter on "outrages" to General HAWLEY, of Connecticut, I deem it proper on this occasion to claim a few minutes' attention from the House to vindicate myself for the course I saw proper to pursue in order to protect the republicans of my State from personal violence and intimidation at the late election.

By reference to the report of the majority of the committee, page 44, it will be seen that those gentlemen vindicate the truthfulness of my letter in the following paragraph:

> In this connection, and as an act of justice to a gentleman who has been bitterly denounced, we find that Mr. HAYS had reasonable grounds upon which to base his letter to Mr. HAWLEY at the time it was written, and that in the main the same is corroborated by the testimony.

Had not a minority of the committee, instead of addressing themselves to a refutation of the facts as contained in the printed testimony taken by the committee, if this was possible, seen fit to devote the greater portion of their report to personal abuse of myself I should have remained silent; but, sir, knowing as I do the condition of affairs in that State, feeling that every general charge which I have made has been sustained by the evidence, I feel constrained to point the attention of the country to the fact that this minority intend to divert the notice of the people from the terrible and atrocious crimes against the freedom of the ballot-box and liberty of the people which have been committed in Alabama by making a personal attack upon me.

The minority of that committee say:

> That, with the exception of the murder of Billings and Ives in Sumter County and the burning of the two school-houses in Russell County, every specification made in the letter of Mr. HAYS was without the shadow of foundation, or so grossly exaggerated as to lose almost all resemblance of facts presented to that committee.

It could not have been supposed, Mr. Speaker, by any sane man, that I had visited every portion of the territory of the State covered by the specifications in my HAWLEY letter to glean the facts. In the very nature of things I was compelled to rely upon the truth of statements made to me by parties in whose veracity I had reason to repose confidence; and while I am free to admit that as to some minor facts I was misled, I publicly declare here to-day that the general charge of lawlessness and murder which I made against a portion of the people of Alabama has been sustained beyond the question of a doubt. Indeed, sir, the truth of the enormity of these crimes has never been and perhaps never will be told.

What men have suffered and endured for political opinion's sake in many portions of that State has been only partially developed by the labors of your investigating committee.

I desire specifically to mention some of the circumstances surrounding a few of the charges which I made in that letter. First, as to the Choctaw County affair. The reports of that affair were given to me by William B. Jones, United States commissioner, and a gentleman who is at present in full accord with the democratic party of the State. Had I mistrusted that Mr. Jones would so soon become a convert to the principles of democracy, it is probable that I should not have attached much importance to the statements made to me; but believing then that these statements were true, I published them to the country, and did not learn until after the publication of my letter that I had been misled as to the number of murders committed in that county.

Now, sir, while it may be true that I was mistaken as to the exactness of locality, yet I fully believe that no one will deny the general allegation that there does exist in that county and section of the State an organized system of lawlessness which is a blot upon the fair name and fame of the people.

Again, the minority of the committee say that I falsely "alleged that eight murders had taken place in Sumter County."

Now, sir, by reference to page 1191 of the printed testimony it will be noted that perhaps I was mistaken in my enumeration of the murders committed in Sumter County; but it is there in evidence that Major Bolton—a leading democrat—had acknowledged that some "seventeen or twenty or thirty negroes were killed," and he said: "We do not want it to go out that but three were killed; we do not want the world to know that but three were killed." So if I erred in this matter, it seems from democratic testimony that I placed the number of murders at a much less figure than a knowing democrat did.

It is the democrats and their allies that wish to conceal these murders in the South. It is the democrats and their allies that have driven out of my county and out of my district every single northern man who went there and carried the flag of the Union except Luther R. Smith. I represent upon this floor fourteen counties in the State of Alabama, and I desire to say here that in those counties numbers of men who followed that old flag that floats to-day over our country settled in my district; they carried their money there; they bought land there; they did not say what political party they belonged to, or what purpose they had in view; but they said they had done so for the purpose of working out an existence in the State of Alabama as citizens there. After they did that, and after Alabama had refused to support the fifteenth amendment and the negroes had the franchise conferred upon them, they chose to vote; and the very moment that they chose to vote the republican ticket ostracism, persecution, vilification, and murder reigned supreme around their domiciles. They were driven from their adopted homes, and to-day the only living man remaining who carried that flag or who followed the Union Army in that country is Luther R. Smith, the judge of the circuit court in my district, and he would not be there to-day if he had not "toadied" to the democratic party, which, so help me God, I never attempted to do and never will if I can help it.

But not to digress further. As to the charge that I had falsely reported that W. P. Lipscomb, a prominent republican, was "publicly shot to death on the public road," I have to say that I gathered that information from a telegraphic dispatch published and republished in a number of the democratic papers of the State. They vouched for its authenticity, and if it was a democratic lie, I can only remark that it was nothing unusual on their part.

It is very easy, Mr. Speaker, for the minority of this committee who have gone to Alabama to come back with a whitewashed report of the doings of their Ku-Klux political brothers in that crime-ridden country.

They tell us Alabama has the same peace and quiet within her borders that Georgia has, that Mississippi has. I am free to admit it, sir; and that peace is the peace that the wolf gives to the lamb, or the assassin to his victim. It is, sir, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is wont to remark, "the peace of the grave."

The colored men, who compose the body of the republican party, have been made "peaceful" by the shot-gun of the raiding white-leaguer, the bowie-knife of the southern desperado, or the whip-lash of an ex-slave master.

Sir, it is in evidence in the testimony taken before your Alabama investigating committee that witnesses were afraid to be examined before that committee for fear that they too might be made "peaceful" after they had retired from the investigating room.

I do not desire to claim the attention of this House in arguing as to the truth or falsity of the charges of intimidation, violence, and murder in Alabama.

The book of testimony that is at the command of every member on this floor most fully sustains every specification made, and the committee say in substance that the atrocities committed in Alabama are such as have only been "witnessed heretofore in savage warfare."

It remains to be seen if in America, this boasted land of liberty and freedom, an American citizen has the right to utter such sentiments as he may see fit not in derogation of the Constitution of our country.

If the republican party allows this session of Congress to end without throwing some protecting ægis over the shoulders of republicans in Southern States, our doom is sealed; liberty of speech will be throttled, and maintenance of liberty in that country will be "among the things that were." If you have no helping hand to offer the republicans of the South in their struggle against the desperate and reckless attempts of the White League democracy to destroy the Government, you may as well sound the funeral knell of liberty and independence in that country. We do not want to suspend the habeas corpus writ to intimidate voters; we do not want soldiers to overawe white men; but what we do want is a fair chance to express ourselves at the ballot-box for the men of our choice.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say one other thing to you and the members of this House. No man understands so well or knows so well the dangers of the seas as those that have been upon them. I have been "there," and I know whereof I speak.

Sir, the very moment that a man goes into the southern country, especially into my district, he is watched. Let him be a northern man and set himself down quietly and peacefully and orderly; let him be a democrat or a republican, and he is recognized there as one of the best "fellows" in the world if he carries capital with him. But the moment he votes the republican ticket, capital or not, then he is obnoxious to every man in that country. The very moment he votes the democratic ticket he is one of the "winers and diners" of that hospitable land. So far as I am individually concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to ask of them. I went into the confederate army and I tried to do my duty there to the best of my ability. When the war ended I proposed to recognize this Government "as the Government of the people, for the people, and by the people," and to submit to its authority quietly and orderly.

I was a Douglas democrat, opposed to secession, and was one of those who went to the Charleston convention. Sir, I think my record is clear; and I am sorry to see such men as those men on this floor who voted supplies to the armies of the North, who voted supplies to the Government to go down there and conquer the southern people, come up here to-day to arraign me for doing that which they had imposed upon me. I do not know what position that gentleman took who occupied the floor to-day, [Mr. BUCKNER;] where he was during the war; whether he was in the Federal Army or in the confederate army; and I care not. But, sir, when a man comes to me and says that I propose to malign my own people he says that which is not true. I do not propose to malign my own people. I do not propose to say anything on God's earth that would pluck one laurel from the wreath of Alabama's fame. No, sir; I had rather be banished in oblivion. The bones of my father are there, and my children are there, and the dearest ties that I have got on earth. All of my people are there to-day, and the last tie that I have got upon earth is to Alabama and her sacred soil; "polluted never, so help me God." I am here to-night to declare that I would never malign her people or do aught to bring upon them injustice or oppression.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a duty that impels me which, in my judgment, is paramount to any local feeling. There is a national duty. It is a duty I owe to that flag which floats above your head. It is a duty that I owe to the country and to the Government of my fathers. It is a duty that I owe to myself and to my children and to my children's children that may come after me. That duty bids me protect the helpless and defend the right. The oppressed people of my State look to me to tell you of their condition and to plead with you in their behalf. They have stood to me in all the dark and dreary hours of the past; they have toiled for me and mine (some of them) when the yoke of slavery was upon them; and now in the hour of their need, come weal or woe, I will be true to them.

Mr. Speaker, some people arraign me for being a republican, and point at me as one of those who followed the confederate flag until it was furled in disaster and defeat. I have no apology to make to such men. I did follow it and wanted it to succeed. But it did not succeed, and when it failed I was one of those who proposed to remain quietly and peaceably at home upon my plantation and vote for whatever I thought best for the people of my State and my country.

Sir, I was forced into the position that I have taken here to-night. I was forced into the position I occupy upon this floor. The very moment that I said to the people of my country that I proposed to be a republican and that I proposed to obey the honorable edicts of those who had fought and carried the flag of the Union through the land I was denounced, (and let me say just here that they freed as many slaves of mine as they did of any other man in my country or upon this floor.) I have followed the fortunes of the republican party because I believed it was right, and because I believed that such a course would bring us peace, happiness, and prosperity. Upon those who charge me with being the maligner of my people I hurl back the imputation, and trust to posterity for that vindication which should be dear to every honorable man in the land.

Now, sir, the question has come to this: whether we shall have another revolution or whether we shall abide by the decision of the majority of the people of this nation! The question has resolved itself into this: Is this a "government of the people, for the people, and by the people," or is it a government of a country which proposes to control all votes of the people by intimidation and violence? The "bacon" affair alluded to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] is a matter of small consideration to me. I had nothing to do with it. I was asked by the governor of my State to appoint gentlemen to distribute it, and I appointed the very best men I knew of to distribute those supplies. I was engaged at the time in a canvass in the State of Alabama, in fourteen counties. I did not know what was going on, and I never saw a hogshead or a pound of the bacon referred to in my life, and there is not a man upon the floor that believes that I ever did. My democratic colleagues on the floor know that when men assail me about a matter of that kind they are "reckoning without their host." They do not know the position I have occupied heretofore in my own country, but there are democrats on this floor who followed me in the confederate army through Kentucky, and who were with me in the retreat from that State, who know me well. I appeal to them to vindicate me on this floor; and I know they will do it.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come that we should cast about to see where we stand. It is a question how the Federal Government stands in the South; how the people of Alabama stand to-day, governed as they are by a governor elected on a platform of proscription and by a Legislature proscriptive in every single instance against the party that they have succeeded.

I do not know that I shall make, Mr. Speaker, any more remarks on this subject. I only wish to pay a parting call to my colleague from the Mobile district, [Mr. BROMBERG,] who rose in his place "to explain," and with the pompous zeal and officious tone of all new converts assailed me. He is one of the men that "captured" me. He deserted his country when the war came upon us in the South and fled—shall I say northward—westward, yes, "westward the course of empire takes its way." Yet, sir; he claimed no "place in the picture nearest the flash of the guns;" he "struck" for the "green graves of his sires;" he "skedaddled," "standing not upon the order of his going;" he "went" North and he remained there in "non-combative" seclusion, curbing the martial southern spirit that he evinces now, until "white-winged peace" had fanned his warlike brow. And what did he do then? Why, his very first act was to return to his sunny southern home and "catch" all the "fellows" he could in the State of Alabama to join his radical party, and I am one of the "fellows" my colleague from the Mobile district [Mr. BROMBERG] captured.

The gentleman tells us that the story of the falsity of outrages cannot be "truthfully contradicted." Such an expression, coming from one who not long since was wont to touch the chords of the negro lyre, and suck with near-sighted energy the teat of the public Treasury, is peculiarly refreshing. Doubtless the gentleman has forgotten the time of the riot in Mobile, when Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, (why is it not Mr. KELLEY here,) was driven from the rostrum. Somewhere about that time his present White League brethren fired into his private residence, and doubtless would have been delighted to take the scalp of my erratic neighbor that night. Is not that so, Mr. BROMBERG?

Mr. BROMBERG. That was two years later.

Mr. HAYS. Ah, Mr. Speaker, they fired into it anyhow. There is "method in the madness" of my erratic colleague. If he was still the "radical" postmaster of the city of Mobile, perhaps he might now be singing peans of praise to the "radical party." Yes, sir, strange as it may seem, my zealous friend, now so eager to repel any "imputation" upon "southern honor," has an "official and private history." Ben: Perley Poore does not give it in our "record" of statesmen, but yet he has it. Once upon a time he was called the leader of the "nigger party" in Mobile, and "nightly" presided over hosts almost equal to those hurled with Lucifer from the battlements of heaven. True these hosts were "black," yet the democratic papers then said my friend was the "blackest sheep in the flock." Yes, sir, he was "grand chief scalawag" among us all; he raised the hymns in our "midnight gatherings," and in good old Methodist style shook us by the hand when we "jined the little German band." Oftentimes when I have gazed upon his melancholy face in "secret leagues," "radical caucuses," and "black and tan" conventions, Homer's touching picture of the last sad scene between the noble Hector and his disconsolate family rose before my sympathetic imagination. We were all wont to say, "Brother BROMBERG feels what he says."

But, one from "the noble army of martyrs" had to be dropped That public pap which once he took with astonishing regularity had to be taken away from him. He clutched the "bitter cup" with patriotic firmness, but at length it passed away. I had the honor of helping the gentleman into the "walks of private life." He was chagrined, and in the desperation of his heart he joined the democracy, who have just run him the second time for Congress, and got him beaten by one of our "colored brethren" by a small majority of from twenty-five hundred to three thousand. He now sees his chance to traduce his old party associates, and make himself a fame among his new ones. Take him, gentlemen, and "may God have mercy on your souls." He proved false to us; may he not prove so to you!

But, Mr. Speaker, I will say no more on this; but before I conclude let me say to my friends that the time for action has arrived—the supreme test has come. It is a battle between law and lawlessness, between law-abiders and law-breakers.

It may seem idle to tell you, but unless something is done to avert the coming storm the waves of a new revolution, terrible in its magnitude, bitter in its hatred, and disastrous in its results, will be upon you.

In conclusion, as for the maledictions which the democratic leaders and party press deem proper to bestow upon me for my faithful discharge of duty to my country and my State, I shall endure them in silence and peace, and trust to that spirit of justice which sooner or later must come to vindicate my record from the aspersions which have been so foully cast upon it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut Mr. Speaker, I had not desired to speak upon this bill or on this subject, and my urgency to-night in seeking that the floor might be left open was for the sake of others who I supposed did desire to occupy the time of the House and who would not be likely to obtain the floor otherwise. I hoped that before this debate closed some Representative would express substantially the views which I hold upon this question, but I fear that that may not be the case, and therefore I propose in a very imperfect and irregular way to indicate my opinions. It may not be improper to make a personal remark to begin with. I have been a radical abolitionist from my earliest days. I began on reaching my majority as a member of the free-soil party. I fought in it with all my might until the republican party was formed, and I joined that party. I went into the service of the Union the first day of the war, and I staid in it until I was honorably discharged after the close. I have worked with the republican party for its most radical measures, the thirteenth fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments included. So my record on that subject is tolerably clear and radical.

But I am coming to a time now when I must seriously consider whether I shall go on with some of my radical associates. I am compelled in a measure to part company with them, but I dislike to do it. A very few minutes will suffice to tell why I must take another path this once. I cannot agree to put any further or greater powers into the hands of any President of the United States. I think the existing laws upon the statute-book are strong enough for the preservation of all the rights guaranteed by the Federal Government, full and strong enough for the fulfillment and discharge of all the obligations resting upon that Government.

Now, I acknowledge the unhappy condition of affairs in the South. I am compelled to believe in the substantial correctness of that admirably-drawn report presented by Messrs. HOAR, FRYE, and WHEELER. I think the conclusions they have stated commend themselves to all impartial men as sustained by the evidence and the general course of affairs in the South.

But gentlemen say, if that be so, if that terrible arraignment be just, "are you not ready then to put into the hands of the President the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus over any portion of the Union and for an indefinite time?" No; I am not. "Are you not ready to go on? Are you not ready that still further and further and further terms shall be imposed to make that people good, and to control the elections there?" No; I am not.

"Then you acknowledge yourself to be without power to remedy these evils?" To a large extent I do acknowledge it. There are wrongs there that we can never reach in this Hall until we have changed the Constitution of the United States. There is a social, and educational, and moral reconstruction of the South needed that will never come from any legislative halls, State or national; it must be the growth of time, of education, and of Christianity. We cannot perfect that reconstruction through statutes, if we had all the powers of the State Legislature and of Congress combined. We cannot put justice, liberty, and equality into the hearts of a people by statutes alone. "But," say you, "if that be true, then this Government is imperfect." I say it is; you all acknowledge it. We all know that this Federal Government which we are administering here is an imperfect government. It does not reach into all the relations of life. It does not directly protect all the rights of humanity, it does not profess to. Theft and robbery and murder may be common in a State, may be said to prevail all over a State, and if those crimes are not committed in accordance with the plans of any wide-spread conspiracy, if they do not come under the head of insurrection, or invasion, or rebellion, and do not touch the mails, or the Federal laws, powers, and duties, how are you to interfere with them? Your brother living in Alabama may be most foully murdered before your very eyes and the eyes of your fellow-citizens, and the authorities of the neighborhood may see and know it, and may utterly refuse to take any notice of it whatever; and we sitting in this Hall may be and are absolutely powerless to interfere, if it be not done as a part of a rebellion or an invasion or in disobedience to some Federal law. And murders like that may be repeated in the next town, and the next, and the next, and there may be five thousand of such murders in that State in five years, and this Federal Government is absolutely powerless. We all see that, and all know and accept it. So this is an imperfect government, and was constituted as an imperfect one; perfect within the lines it has laid down for itself, but outside of those lines absolutely powerless.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question on a point about which I wish to hear from him? Why is this Government less powerful to protect an American citizen in Florida than one in Cuba?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is a fair question. I was coming to that very point. Take the case of an American citizen going into France, Austria, or England. Let his family or himself be there outraged or robbed, or let some of his family be murdered. Should there be any hesitation on the part of the authorities of the place and country to give him full and ample justice, the entire power of forty millions of people is at the back of the President to vindicate his rights as an American citizen, and the President would be impeached and hurled headlong from the White House who did not protect that man to the extent of the nation's power. Every lawyer knows that that precise occurrence might be duplicated in any State and the President be absolutely without a particle of power to interfere to prevent or punish. Is not that constitutional law? No lawyer will deny it for a moment. This serves to illustrate the proposition (I might prolong my illustrations by the hour) that this is a Government of certain defined and limited powers. It was constituted upon the belief that, taking an enlarged view and running through a long series of years, the personal rights of the citizen would be best protected by this limited local State sovereignty around him; that on the whole these twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty State sovereignties would protect in general the personal rights of the citizen, while this Federal Government, constituted in whatever way you please, (whether by the people at large or by a confederation of the States does not for my present purpose make any difference,) would protect a certain wider range of rights—would protect the national existence, and would also in certain other well understood cases protect the citizen against great wrongs within his own State; that is, would interfere in cases of domestic violence or insurrection or invasion, while the State as a little republic within itself would take care of him in all the other respects not provided for in the national Constitution. That was the theory.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman state to the House why the President under the law or Constitution has any more right or authority to bring the power of forty millions of people to protect a citizen abroad than at home?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Well, I sincerely think, with due respect for my able friend from Michigan, that it can hardly be necessary for me to restate my position on that question. Did I not say, and does not every lawyer know, that in Hartford my neighbor next door on my right hand may murder my neighbor next door to me on the left hand; the grand juror to whom I complain as soon as I can reach him may say, "I do not care; it was a justifiable homicide;" or "I do not care anyhow." He may refuse on whatever ground to interfere. The State's attorney may give me no attention when I go to him. The proper authorities may refuse to take notice of the criminal neglect of the prosecuting officers. Even the governor may refuse to hear me. Yet if I go to the President he will simply say, "This is a matter legitimately belonging to your own State authorities only; it does not involve any crime against the United States. I see in it no violation of United States laws. It is a gross, an awfully wicked and criminal neglect on the part of your people to protect themselves. But I do not see how I can send my Army there or my United States attorneys there to interfere in the matter." Now, is not that a correct statement?

Mr. CONGER. Where does the gentleman find the authority of the President to interfere, with the power of forty millions of people, to protect a citizen of the United States in a foreign country?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Well, I find it in every book on international law that was ever written; I find it in the fact that when we enter the family of nations, it is not for any member of that family to make distinctions between State and Federal sovereignties. It is not the State of Connecticut, nor the State of Alabama, nor the State of Ohio, nor the State of Pennsylvania, that appears in England to protect the American citizen. It is a nation known as the United States—one of the family of nations—which goes there clothed with all the powers belonging to any national entity, to vindicate the American citizen. Of course, when I speak of the President, I speak of him as typifying the United States Government with all its powers.

Mr. CONGER. Did the gentleman then mean simply to say that Congress could make such laws in the way of declaring war, &c., as would secure the vindication of an American citizen suffering injustice abroad? Or did he mean to say that the power was vested in the President?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. O, no; I think the gentleman ought not to have understood me in that way. When I said "the President," I meant the whole Federal power; I meant the nation—Congress united with the President.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman mean anything more than that the citizen when injured abroad is protected by the "instinctive sense of justice" of "forty millions of people," and that the President is required to execute that?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I mean that he is protected by all national obligations—by justice and humanity and common sense. Of course we all know that the President cannot declare war. I meant to speak of him as representing the Federal power.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I wish to put a question to the gentleman. I understand him to say that when a citizen of the United States suffers wrong in a foreign country, the President of the United States, wielding the power of "forty millions of people," has a right to correct the wrong.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The President representing the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Now, if a citizen of the United States is murdered in England, I want to know from the gentleman on what ground the President of the United States can interfere for the punishment of that murder, any more than he can interfere in the State of Connecticut in a similar case? If that foreign government does not by its laws provide for the protection of the citizen of the United States, have we any right to attempt it?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. O, Mr. Speaker, I thought I was talking to lawyers mainly.

A MEMBER. You are mistaken.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Why, of course in such a case as that the President, through the Secretary of State and the American minister near the Court of Saint James, would make application in due form to the British government; he would receive a communication in reply stating that due justice would be done in the case; that the criminal would be promptly arrested and prosecuted; that proper reparation would be made; that indemnity would be allowed to the widow and orphans of the murdered man; or that government would say "We do not care anything about your miserable Yankee;" in which case the President would lay the facts before Congress. There would then probably be a declaration of war and a great fight on land and sea. That is what I meant.

It does not follow that because a thing would be good if it were done, therefore Congress ought to do it. There are a good many things I should like to see done in every Southern State—yes, in Northern States too; yet the attempt to have Congress do them I would resist to the uttermost. I think that is obvious. Now I have not the time to enlarge upon these points. I do scarcely more than state them as legal propositions.

I have a few words more. We hear a good deal said about centralization and the tendency to put or take too much power into the hands of the Federal Government, the Executive and Congress as well. I want to say this now in the spirit of fraternity and friendship for my southern friends here. Who are the centralizers? You say we are, because our hearts are warmed up whenever we hear of great wrongs in the lately rebellious States. We begin to draught Federal statutes and then we stop for a while to look at the law-books and think what our fathers tried to make of this Government, and we hesitate. I am one of those who hesitate. But you say we are the centralizers, that we are the men who seek to usurp power.

I am quite sure that if we pass the bills now before us, and follow them on and on in that direction and begin to creep over, to march over the proper lines of State sovereignty and grasp more and more power for the sake—and that is the motive in our hearts—for the sake of securing liberty, justice, equallty, and peace for the people down there, it will not be our fault altogether. Reflect, my friends of the South! When we were plunged into that great war we went on and on with it, and finally became sure there was no other way to root out, to absolutely clean out, the whole great wrong but to abolish slavery; and we made four millions of people free. Then, thinking there was no other way to secure liberty, to secure the freedom we gave them, we gave also to this poor people the right of suffrage. We knew how you would feel in regard to them, but we felt obliged to take this course. We felt that we had come under solemn obligations as the friends and in a peculiar way the guardians of those people, bound to see fair play given them. That is what troubles many of us. It is an obligation of honor as well as of constitutional law, and we cannot endure to see the wrongs which we must believe exist there. I do not want to believe it; but there are wrongs grievous and terrible there, some of them owing to circumstances, to peculiarities of society and civilization existing before the war as well as now, some of them owing to that spirit of resistance to Government and its measures which naturally enough remains a residuum of the rebellion. But if you want to check these tendencies to centralization you can do it. You my former enemies in the field, you officers of the confederate army, you the former slaveholders, you can do it; you can quiet this movement in a week by giving us the solemn assurance here from men who I know will keep their word that you will put an end to Ku-Kluxism and put an end to the White League; that you will see fair play by any being that walks on two legs and received a soul from God. Do that, my friends, and there will be no longer any desire to go down and interfere with you; no longer any desire, creditable I say to our honor and our manhood, to strain the Federal power to establish justice there and everywhere.

That is an appeal I should like to make in the face of every white-leaguer in the South. Remember what obligations we are under to these men, the white Unionists and the black Unionists. Think how you would yourselves feel in regard to suffering and appealing friends in another section if the case were reversed. I know you; I was born among you; came away early, to be sure; but I have kept up the traditions of the South and many associations and friendships. I want you to see the beauty there is in the doctrine of universal liberty, equality, and fraternity—the glorious beauty there is in it. Love it and adopt it in dealing with your former slaves. I would rather trust them with many of you to-day than with a great many northern men. Treat them as your own friends and neighbors, your full equals in all rights under the law, treat them with patience and full, unswerving justice, allowing full liberty of political creed and action, and you will have struck an effectual, final death blow to what you dread as centralism.

But, my good friends, let me give you a warning. If these wrongs continue, if we hear of Ku-Klux living and flourishing, if the white-leaguers go on, if murders and outrages and ostracism for political opinion go on, and thereby nourish a spirit of hostility and rebellion to the Government and establish caste and a relation between so-called dominant and subject races by a spirit that may keep out of the statutes but be more effectual than statute-books; if you and others, the real gentlemen of the South, do not put these things down, you will give an additional heat and strength from day to day and from week to week to the desire to do justice there, and by and by the fire will burst and blaze out as once before; and if it does come, if the slow and sluggish North shall at length arise in the hot blood of war, I shall dread the future of my country, for State lines will vanish like tow in the fire and right will be rendered at whatever cost. We will have a centralized government, reaching down with abundant power, with all power, to the lowest citizen. But it will be over the ruins of the original theory of the Republic, and it will be in the end, I fear, the destruction, the final failure of this great experiment of free government.

I have spoken without reserve. I know some of you of the South can adopt some of these ideas. I shall go home to my people now on a campaign and make very much this sort of a speech over and over again. That is the way I am going to talk there. You can help those of us who believe in the proper theory of government, or you can strengthen those of our friends whose motive is an honorable one and who are working in the direction of centralization.

I shall watch the pending bill carefully. I cannot vote, in time of peace, without the most powerful evidence of great and immediate necessity, to put this tremendous power of suspending the writ of habeas corpus in the hands of a President of the United States; any President, George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, or Ulysses S. Grant. I doubt not that as time passes Ulysses S. Grant will be vindicated from the charges that now rest upon him—charges so reiterated that many have come to believe them. I believe he desires justice, equality, obedience, and peace, and only that, in the South. But I would tell him, if he were my own father and I believed he had the wisdom of Solomon, that I could not vote to give him this power; for I do not believe it is for the good of the nation, and I will not do it.

I trust to see the ideas of the republican party triumph in this nation. To a very large extent they are now incorporated, crystallized in the Constitution of the United States. I want to see them prevail not only in the letter of the Constitution and the law, but in the hearts of the people. I understand those gentlemen who believe that the welfare and even the existence of the country are to a large extent dependent upon a perpetuation of our party. But we must be very careful how we permit that consideration to govern us in discussing constitutional questions. Why, sir, see how the honest and candid man who wrote that article in this morning's Washington Republican regards the question. He closed as follows:

THE PASSAGE OF THE BILL IS REQUIRED TO PRESERVE TO THE REPUBLICAN PARTY THE ELECTORAL VOTES OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

REMEMBER THAT IF THE DEMOCRATS CARRY ALL THE SOUTHERN STATES, AS THEY WILL IF THE WHITE LEAGUE USURPATION IN SOME OF THEM IS NOT SUPPRESSED, IT WILL REQUIRE ONLY FIFTY DEMOCRATIC ELECTORAL VOTES FROM THE NORTHERN STATES TO ELECT A DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENT. THIS IS A LIBERAL ESTIMATE.

All this in large capitals. Well, now, the writer honestly thinks that liberty, that justice, equality, and fraternity will be trampled in the dust if the republican party does not succeed. He thinks it will be a wise policy to go to the very verge of constitutional power—even under his own acknowledgment—to perpetuate that party in power. I cannot say that. I prefer to adhere to the doctrines that I think will wear best for fifty years to come, and if need be to go into a minority. If the democratic party should carry this country in 1876 and should fail to live up to the ideas that we have impressed upon this Constitution and these laws, if it should fail to carry them into its Federal and State legislation in a true spirit and without hesitation or evasion, it will go out of power. Do not let any of those men who devotedly believe in the lost cause flatter themselves that there is to be a reaction of that kind. The North desires simply to guard the Constitution. If there be a reaction, it has come because of some abuses that have crept into the republican party, and not because that party's great ideas are not forever enshrined in the hearts of our people; not because they do not stand ready by ballot or by sword to vindicate the truth. The ideas will live. Those I work for and pray for. The organization may go into the dust, but our doctrines will arise and rule this land.

Mr. BROMBERG. Will the gentleman from Connecticut answer me one question? I know he is a fair gentleman. What does he mean by the White League and white-leaguers?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I hope the gentleman will excuse me for not entering into that part of the subject. An organization, good or bad, take your own view of it—an organization exists called the White League.

Mr. BROMBERG. In what States does it exist?

Mr HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not know how many.

Mr. BROMBERG. I desire to say that it does not exist in the State of Alabama, for one.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Alabama has not reached the millennium yet, no more than has Louisiana.

Mr. BIERY. When I came here to-night I did not intend to speak. I desire, however, to say a few words on this question. I have heard a few remarks that pained me as a citizen of this great Republic.

When I read the Constitution of my country I find in the preamble this:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

I find that that instrument was adopted for great and noble purposes. The question arises here to-day, in the face of all the facts we have in connection with the southern country, whether that preamble is being carried out to-day. If it be, then truly are we safe; if any of these principles are being trodden under foot, if any of them are being disregarded anywhere in this country, then in my judgment whatever wrong is perpetrated ought to be righted and protection afforded against the future perpetration of such wrongs. Unless all the evidence that has been taken by the committees that have been sent into the Southern States to investigate affairs and facts there are untrue, unless the men who have come here and when they took their seats on this floor swore that they would defend the Constitution of their country and perform their duties as legislators are committing perjury and are submitting as facts what are not facts according to sworn testimony, then we have great reason to believe that some of the great principles that are laid down in the very preamble of the Constitution are being disregarded, are being outraged in the southern part of the country. If that testimony be true, then we find that State governments are being subverted by what may be termed mobs. I allude particularly to the State of Arkansas. As I understand the facts in that case, there can be no pretense at all, under the evidence taken by the committee sent down to investigate, that the present government of Garland & Co. has any validity whatever. If we go to Louisiana, what do we find? We find such a state of facts as will characterize some of the lower governments on the face of the globe, but no republican government.

But, sir, if we want to find a subversion of the rights of the people and non-protection of life and property, it is not necessary to travel over the whole southern country. I do not intend to refer to any great extent to the facts, because they are patent to every one that listens to me; but the question is, What shall be done with the country? Shall we suffer right to be trampled under foot when the State courts refuse or neglect to punish crime in the shape of murder; when men ride at night and take their fellow citizens from their beds and take them out and hang them; when they shoot them down on the street; when trains are flagged and United States officers in the shape of mail carriers are shot on the train and not as much as an investigation is had upon the subject to ascertain who perpetrated the outrage? These men apologize for these crimes, and say, "Do you not have crimes in the Northern States and cities? Have you no murders there; no assassinations?" We have none of that kind. There is a difference in crime in this country. There is one kind of crime which is perpetrated in all civilized communities; but there is another sort of crime committed in certain parts of this country. When a man thinks that because men advocate political principles which they believe in they ought therefore to be persecuted, the government of that part of the country is not republican in form. As I understand republican government, it is a government where the people rule through their chosen representatives. Shall it be said that America, which boasts of its freedom, has certain States in which a man cannot go and carry with him the sentiments of a free man? Shall it be said that America has any part within its borders where a man is not safe in person and property because of the political principles which he avows?

Sir, we boast of our freedom. We tell foreign monarchs that their institutions of government are not those of freemen, are not fitted for the highest type of liberty. What do we do ourselves? When a man goes into a Southern State—take Louisiana, for instance, or take Alabama—and we find that murders and outrages are committed there because of the political sentiments of the person murdered or outraged, are you going to tell foreign monarchs that this is the freedom which is superior to their institutions?

Sir, the blush of shame mantles on my cheek when I hear gentlemen apologizing for the President and when I hear men talk as I heard a member on this floor not long ago who said that he would let hell reign in the South for a time until the North was aroused.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If the gentleman refers to me, he must not misrepresent me. He refers to what was said in caucus, which he has no right to mention and misquotes it. I said that wrongs existed in the South, and great wrongs; but that the North did not want to believe it, and would not. I said that I did not know that they would believe it at all until things were let to run there, and hell was allowed to reign.

Mr. CESSNA. I do not see the difference between the quotation and the explanation.

Mr. BIERY. I ask the gentleman if he did not use substantially that language in that connection.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I did not say that; I do not pretend to quote my words to the letter. I was misquoted in the papers by somebody who had no business to report what was said in caucus, but I did not notice it. But now that I am misquoted in the House I must correct it. I said that there were wrongs in the South, great wrongs, but the North did not believe it, and I did not think there was any way in which they could be convinced until things were let to run there to such an extent that hell would reign in the South.

Mr. BIERY. I have no desire to misrepresent the gentlemen; I would not misrepresent any one. I only want to ask him whether he did not use that language in that connection.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have made my explanation, and the gentleman can now state it in any way he pleases and make the best of it.

Mr. BIERY. I will simply say this in reference to that question, that it did not seem to me to be just that any innocent man should suffer in this country in order to raise a spirit of antagonism in any other part of the country. As I understand it, it is the duty of this Government to protect the humblest citizen in every part of its domain. And when it fails to do that, then your Government is a mockery. When my Government refuses to lend me its aid when I am in danger anywhere because of political sentiments or because of any principles that I hold and advocate fearlessly in the face of anybody, then I say that the government fails in its duty to me. This Government is not a sham, and ought not to be made a sham. Governments are set up for the good of the people that are governed by them.

What further do we find in the South? As I understand it, we find not only that the State courts of justice do not apprehend, convict, and punish criminals, but we find that the cause of education is being interfered with, and that for certain classes of its citizens the means of education are becoming extinct in the South. I refer to the colored citizens, when I refer to the number of republicans who live there. The schools are being fast closed to every child of color down there. Wherever there are no schools established for them specifically, they are shut out from all opportunity of acquiring knowledge. It is so in regard to the churches in which to worship God.

We find that in some of the States where it is claimed there is peace and quiet, it is the peace of death and the quiet of the grave so far as certain of its citizens are concerned. We are told that the State of Georgia is quiet; that it is peaceable there; that there are no outrages there. Why is it peaceable there? Because certain people see fit to keep their mouths shut rather than die. To-day seventy-five thousand of the colored citizens of Georgia see proper to remain away from the polls and not exercise the high privilege of an American citizen to cast his ballot for the man he wants to put into office. Therefore Georgia has no assassinations and is quiet. And you can have that kind of peace all over the South, and that is the only kind of peace you will get in the South when the white men who are leagued together to accomplish their purposes shall have succeeded.

Now do you want that kind of peace there? Having declared that the colored man is a citizen of this country, it is your duty to protect him in every right that you and I exercise. When you fail to do that by means of every power this Government has, then in my judgment you fail in a very vital part of your duty.

The bill that is now before this House for consideration is a long one and has many provisions. But the principal clause that is antagonized here is that which proposes to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. The Constitution puts that power into the hands of the President. In the first place, it defines what shall be the occasion on which it may be suspended, and then it leaves to his judgment to determine whether circumstances have arisen when he may suspend that great right.

For one I would not make the people of this country familiar with the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus on ordinary occasions. I would not lead the American mind to think that it was a light thing to suspend that great writ, or that it could be suspended except on very extraordinary occasions. But when occasions are presented such as I believe now exist in the southern country, when circumstances arise such as I understand are now in the South, I think it is high time for Congress, for the Government of the United States to take into serious consideration the question whether it will permit that state of things to continue, or whether it will make an honest and earnest effort to check it.

I am as reluctant as any man can be to give my vote to a measure which may be regarded as doing injury to any man in this country. But, sir, believing as I do that there is not only great danger in the subversion of the rights of individuals but that the principle of subversion may be extended from State to State, that unlawful bodies of men may overthrow State governments, and that the same destructive principle may perhaps be applied finally to the central government, I tremble to withhold my vote from a measure which I believe in the discretion of a well-balanced mind (such as the present occupant of the presidential chair has) would enable him to arrest and bring to condign punishment the perpetrators of outrageous crimes.

Has the President to-day any power to interfere with lawless men in any part of the country? Can he arrest a band of men who are riding out at night to take men from their homes and inflict outrages upon them? Why, sir, your blue-coated soldier may stand upon the very spot where murders are perpetrated and he will not dare to fire a shot. What does your Army amount to in the South, except for arrest? When criminals or alleged criminals are turned over to the courts, what happens to them? Why, sir, we were told the other day that out of quite a number of persons apprehended for crime only six were convicted and punished! When this was stated to be the fact in a United States court I inquired what kind of men composed the juries, and I received no answer.

Mr. COOK. I did not hear the gentleman's question; I can answer him now.

Mr. BIERY. I should be very glad to have an answer.

Mr. COOK. Three-fourths of the Federal juries in Georgia are colored men. Upon the last Federal jury in my county there were four colored men and one Jew.

Mr. BIERY. Is that the general character of the juries in the gentleman's State?

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir; that indicates the character of the juries in the State of Georgia.

Mr. BIERY. Is that the character of the jury that acquitted those men?

Mr. COOK. I do not know, sir.

Mr. BIERY. That is a very pertinent question, as the gentleman must see.

Mr. COOK. I know that colored men are on the Federal juries there.

Mr. BIERY. Does the gentleman allude to the juries that convicted those six men?

Mr. COOK. No, sir; I cannot state the composition of the juries that convicted or acquitted. I know that there have been seven hundred and two discontinuances by Federal judges in the South. In my State the white men are excluded from the Federal juries, and the negroes are put upon those juries. In my own county it is not the good substantial white citizens who are put upon the juries. On the last Federal jury in my county, as I have stated, there were four negroes, one white man, (the Federal postmaster,) and a Jew.

Mr. BIERY. I understand, then, that the gentleman cannot tell what kind of men composed the juries that acquitted the men referred to?

Mr. COOK. I speak of the grand juries and the traverse juries—the juries that try the cases. The last time we had a Federal court at Atlanta, negroes sat around the room by the dozen waiting to be summoned upon the juries.

Mr. BIERY. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. In his State are any colored men ever put on juries in the State courts?

Mr. COOK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BIERY. In about what proportion?

Mr. COOK. I do not know in what proportion. But a very large proportion of the white men are not on the juries. Our jury system is organized under a constitution which a republican Congress adopted for us. It has not been changed. Most of our judges who administer the law are republicans. Our whole jury system as now existing was organized under the constitution of 1868, made by a republican convention and ratified by the Congress of the United States. In the county in which I reside there are more than three hundred white men whose names never go into the jury-box, and the case is the same in a large number of counties. On the other hand, in a large number of counties there are negroes whose names are regularly placed in the jury-box, and who are constantly drawn to serve as jurors in the State courts.

Mr. BIERY. As I did not intend to occupy the floor but a few minutes——

Mr. COOK. I merely wanted to answer the gentleman's question. I did not hear it the other day or I would have been very glad to answer.

Mr. BIERY. I am very glad to have had the gentleman's answer. If what he says now in regard to the State courts is true——

Mr. COOK. Well, sir, it is true.

Mr. BIERY. I have no doubt it is true. I do not mean to question the gentleman's veracity, but putting my statement in that form, I repeat that if what the gentleman now says is true in reference to the juries and the courts of his State and the juries in the United States courts there, and if the testimony taken by the men we have sent down there to investigate be also true, then, Mr. Speaker, I think it is high time for the central Government to take hold of this matter. If there is no court down there that will afford proper protection to citizens; if when criminals are placed upon trial juries in so many cases bring in verdicts of acquittal, while murders continue to be committed day by day all over that country, then it is high time I think that we should do something to protect human life in that portion of the Union.

Not wishing to occupy further time, I simply say in conclusion that as an American citizen I am pained to see that men who have not only stood with the republican party but who have fought in defense of the flag of the country are willing to pander to what I believe a spirit of outrage in one part of this country—are ready to sit down folding their hands meekly while the destruction of life and property goes on unopposed.

Mr. COBURN. I now move that the House take a recess until half past nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that for two reasons. In the first place, it is contrary to the agreement that no business should be done this evening. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] has the right to make such a motion, I might move that the House adjourn until Monday. The Digest declares that—

> Where less than a quorum is present the motion to take a recess is not in order, and no motion is in order except for a call of the House or to adjourn.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit there is no quorum present.

Mr. CESSNA. Why not take a recess?

Mr. RANDALL. I object, because it is contrary to the understanding and agreement.

Mr. COBURN. It is not contrary to the understanding or spirit of it.

Mr. RANDALL. It is; as the understanding was that no business whatever was to be done. Now, a recess is in the nature of business. However, the rule is so explicit that there are only two paths for the Chair to travel. There must either be a call of the House or an adjournment.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to say a word on the point, and that is this: The only way to decide—and the question has often been determined—whether a quorum is present or not is upon some vote to be taken, and that vote cannot be had under the agreement. Therefore there is nothing in that part of the gentleman's point.

As to the remaining part of his point of order, that it is against the agreement to take a recess, that in my judgment is a mistake as a matter of fact. When the House agreed unanimously to meet here to-night for debate only, it put into the hands of the House, or those gentlemen of the House who chose to attend, to hold the House until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning. These members, if only three, may stay and hold the House during the parliamentary day until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning. They have the power to stay and hold the House, and they do nothing more and nothing less by taking a recess during part of that time, continuing the discussion until eleven o'clock, the hour of meeting to-morrow. It is therefore strictly within the line of the agreement—within the letter and spirit of the agreement.

Mr. COBURN. I should like to have the Chair state exactly what is the proposition.

Mr. CESSNA. The proposition is to take a recess until nine and a half o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Why not say ten o'clock? That was spoken of a while ago when the House was fuller than it is now as the time to which we should take a recess. I really cannot see why we should not fix ten o'clock instead of nine and a half. To be sure I cannot see precisely from the gentleman's point of view. I cannot see why there should be any objection to taking a recess, as it will give one hour longer for this debate.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. What objection can there be to an adjournment?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The advantage I see in taking a recess is that there is one hour longer of debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to stay here as long as gentlemen may wish to continue the debate, but I rise to the point of order that there is no quorum present, and that brings it within the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. POLAND in the chair.) The gentleman is right in saying a recess is business requiring a quorum of the House if he insists on having a count. There is no quorum present.

Then all that can be done is to have a call of the House or an adjournment. It is manifest, however, that if we should take a recess to ten o'clock to-morrow morning it will afford an additional hour for debate which an adjournment will cut off.

Mr. RANDALL. Take the additional hour for debate from one to two o'clock. They have the power and they can do as they please. We have been here all night during one night and now it is twelve o'clock midnight.

Mr. COBURN. I do not see what you are going to lose if the House shall take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that I frankly acquiesced in his proposition made this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists on having a count on the motion for a recess, and it should turn out there is no quorum, then all we can do is to adjourn or have a call of the House.

Mr. GLOVER. Then let us adjourn.

Mr. CESSNA. The gentleman's objection, then, is to prevent further debate.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I am willing to debate this from now to the 4th of March next.

Mr. CESSNA. But that is to prevent the transaction of any other business. Now as one member of the House I desire to say if debate is not allowed from ten to eleven o'clock to-morrow morning there is one hour to talk less to be allowed.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand perfectly well that the gentleman is prepared to do anything he can which will secure behind him a majority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour from ten o'clock to-morrow of course will be considered as part of this day's legislative session, and will be devoted to debate only.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. COBURN. If the gentleman insists on a count, as it is apparent no quorum is present, we had better adjourn, and I make the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes a. m. Saturday, February 27, 1875) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BIERY: The petition of 112 workers in iron and coal at Allentown, Pennsylvania, for Government aid to the Texas and Pacific Railroad, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. BLAINE: Memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying passage of an act to authorize the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota to cede to each other, mutually, concurrent criminal jurisdiction over the islands in the Mississippi River lying between them, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COX: Numerous petitions of manufacturers and workers in steel, for specific duty of one cent per pound on steel, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HUBBELL: The petition of William W. Curtice and 100 others, of Newaygo County, Michigan, for a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land to every Union soldier, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: Statement of Henry George, of San Francisco, California, relative to the Western Union Telegraph Company, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PACKER: Resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, in relation to an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pennsylvania, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, relative to equalization of bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of citizens of Philadelphia and Baldwin, Pennsylvania, artisans and manufacturers of iron, for Government aid to complete a great southern line of railroad to the Pacific, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. PERRY: Memorial of the Board of Trade of Albany, New York, relative to appropriations for the Signal Service Bureau, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. ROBBINS: Resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, asking an appropriation to build light-houses on Albemarle Sound, to the same committee.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, asking repeal of the tax on State banks, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of citizens of North Carolina, for a post-route from Yadkinville to East Bend, North Carolina, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SMART: The petition of L. C. Land, of Hoosick, New York, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 27, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will announce the committee that was authorized to be appointed to examine and thoroughly investigate the several branches of the civil service, with a view to the reorganization of the several Departments and the reduction of expenditures. The Chair appoints the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] and the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I believe it has never occurred during my short service in the Senate that I have declined the discharge of any duty assigned me in connection with any work here. I wish to state with reference to that committee, however, that my engagements during this coming summer will be such as that it will be next to impossible for me to serve, and my distance from the capital also is such that it will be exceedingly inconvenient for me to come here and return to my home. I therefore trust the Senate will excuse me from service upon this committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask if the Senator from Iowa does not think it would be just as well to rescind the resolution authorizing the committee to sit during the recess?

Mr. WRIGHT. Not at all, Mr. President. The select committee was raised upon the recommendation of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and after very careful consideration. The select committee ought to be continued, but I trust I shall be excused from service upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to excusing the Senator from serving upon the committee? The Chair hears none. The Chair will appoint the other Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to fill the vacancy.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the credentials of Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, chosen by the Legislature of Vermont a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota being authorized to cede to each other mutually criminal jurisdiction over the island in the Mississippi River lying between them; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM. I present a petition of 344 farmers of Minnesota, residing in various parts of the State, asking for appropriations for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; a petition of 518 farmers of the State of Iowa asking for the same appropriation; a petition of 326 farmers of the State of Wisconsin, urging the appropriation for that improvement; and a petition of 86 farmers of the State of Nebraska; a petition of 82 farmers of Dakota Territory; making in all 1,356 farmers of those States and that Territory, which, added to the 48,853 presented the other day, make 50,209 petitioners specifically asking for that thing, or sixteen times as many as were ever presented in any one petition on any subject before, as I am informed.

I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ presented a resolution of a meeting of citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri, soldiers in the late war, in favor of the enactment of a law for the equalization of bounties; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Lucy Jane Thomas, widow of Josiah Thomas, praying indemnity for the loss of property belonging to her husband captured by the rebel cruiser Florida on the high seas in 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PEASE. I present a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of Mississippi, instructing her Senators and Representatives to support the Texas Pacific Railroad. I ask that the resolution be read and laid on the table.

The Secretary read as follows:

Joint resolution in regard to the Texas Pacific Railroad.

Whereas the early construction of the Texas Pacific Railroad, traversing, as it will, a semi-tropical region of great fertility, extensive, varied, and inexhaustible agricultural and mineral resources, and on a route free from the ice and snows which annually obstruct trade and travel on the Union Pacific road, is an unquestionable and vital national necessity; and whereas the early completion of said Texas Pacific Railroad, with its eastern terminus at a point in Louisiana opposite the city of Vicksburgh, will add immensely to the prosperity and the population of Mississippi, increase its productive capital, and enhance its assessable values, thus increasing the revenue of the State, and reducing the rate of taxation imposed upon the citizens, and advancing the State once more on the high road to the happiness and prosperity of all its people: Therefore,

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to give an earnest, cordial, and zealous support to the bill now pending in Congress authorizing the indorsement by the Government of the United States of the bonds of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company to the amount asked for by said company to insure its early completion.

Resolved further, That these resolutions be signed by the governor, and it shall be the duty of the president of the senate to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a certified copy of this preamble and the resolutions accompanying it.

ADELBERT AMES,
Governor.

The resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3712) granting a pension to Stillman C. Spaulding, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3727) granting a pension to John M. Allen, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1606) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Weatherlow, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3705) granting a pension to Arthur M. Lee, late first lieutenant Eighteenth Illinois Infantry, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1328) to amend sections 1675, 1676, 1681, and 1682 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it do pass. I do not know whether it is in order, but the Committee on Foreign Relations would like the Senate to pass this bill at the present time. I believe that committee have had no morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They had yesterday.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Secretary of State has sent us a communication in which he says that it is of a good deal of importance. I therefore trust it will be passed now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations was not in his seat yesterday morning when that committee was called, and but one bill from that committee was passed.

Mr. CAMERON. The chairman was not well yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I must object to any business out of order. The Committee on Commerce has this morning.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar together with the letter of the Secretary of State, which we adopt as the report of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2069) for the relief of the sureties of John L. Robinson, late United States marshal for the district of Indiana, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 937) repealing a portion of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies," approved March 3, 1873, and disapproving and annulling a portion of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia of the date of August 23, 1871, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Fleet Surgeon J. A. Lockwood, praying to be placed on the retired list of the Navy with his former rank and grade of surgeon, from December 23, 1873, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 4466) permitting Lieutenant-Commander Frederick Pearson, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the Queen of Great Britain, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FLANAGAN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1264) referring the claim of the heirs of Chauncy M. Lockwood to the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4790) granting a pension to David Salsbury, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Dickson Williams, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services rendered by his sons in the late war, reported a bill (S. No. 1358) granting a pension to Dickson Williams; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom were referred various memorials of merchants, bankers, and others, citizens of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other cities, remonstrating against canceling the contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for the transportation of the mail between the United States and China and Japan, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 3692) granting a pension to Harriet W. Wilkinson, which was reported adversely on February 25, 1875, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

MISSISSIPPI ALLUVIAL BASIN.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand extra copies of the report of the commission of engineers appointed in compliance with the act of Congress approved June 22, 1874, to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT FOR 1874.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand five hundred copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1874, to report the same back without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives was considered:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That ten thousand five hundred copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1874 be printed; two thousand copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand for the use of the Senate, and seventy-five hundred for the use of the Institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution was concurred in.

FIRST AND NINTH CENSUSES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) to provide for the preservation of the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses, have instructed me to report the same back without amendment and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration. It is merely for binding the manuscript returns.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Congressional Printer to bind, in suitable form for ready reference and for their better preservation, the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAYDEN'S GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL REPORTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the House for printing fifty-five hundred copies of Professor Hayden's annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1873, to report the same back with amendments. We have reduced the number the same as in the case of Professor Raymond's report, to four thousand copies. If these surveys are to be made, I suppose the results of them ought to be printed. I do not know any other way. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed fifty-five hundred copies of Professor Hayden's annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1873; three thousand copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand for the use of the Senate, and fifteen hundred copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The Committee on Printing proposed to strike out "5,500" and insert "4,000," and to strike out "3,000" and insert "2,500," and to strike out "1,500" and insert "500;" so that the resolution will read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed four thousand copies of Professor Hayden's annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1873; twenty-five hundred copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand for the use of the Senate, and five hundred copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives for printing four thousand copies of the annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for the year 1874, to report it with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were in line 5, after the words "two thousand" to insert the words "five hundred," and strike out "one thousand" and insert "five hundred;" so that when amended it would read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed four thousand copies of the annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for the year 1874; one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, twenty-five hundred copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and five hundred copies for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1874, have instructed me to report the same to the Senate. A similar resolution to this was offered last year and there was a very long debate in the Senate upon it. It was discussed for four or five days at different times, and finally the Senate decided to print a very large number of the report. Considering themselves instructed by the action at that time the committee report back the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there shall be printed twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1874; five thousand for the use of the Commissioner, five thousand for the use of the Senate, and ten thousand for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather that should go over. I am opposed to all these motions to print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONOVER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1359) for the relief of Jonathan W. Childs; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL SAMUEL W. CRAWFORD—RETIRED OFFICERS.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective House, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with amendments as follows:

In the fourteenth line after the word "action," add the words "and every such officer now borne on the retired list shall be continued thereon, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2, chapter 38, act of March 30, 1868;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Also, in the seventeenth line, after the words "arm or leg," add the words "or has an arm or leg permanently disabled by reason of resection on account of wounds;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Also, in the eighteenth line, after the word "battle," add the words "And be it also provided, That no retired officer shall be affected by this act who has been retired or may hereafter be retired on the rank held by him at the time of his retirement;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate by which the title was amended, and agree to the same.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
GEO. E. SPENCER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CHAS. ALBRIGHT,
C. D. MACDOUGALL,
P. M. B. YOUNG,
Managers on the part of the House

The report was concurred in.

REPORT ON MINING STATISTICS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution providing for the publication of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics, having met, after a full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment; that all of the concurrent resolution after the word "printed" be stricken out; and that the following be inserted: "of the report for 1873 twenty-five hundred copies for the use of the House, one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five hundred copies for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury and of Commissioner Raymond; and of the report for 1874 twenty-five hundred copies for the use of the House, one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five hundred copies for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury and of Commissioner Raymond."

And the House agree to the same.

H. B. ANTHONY,
TIM. O. HOWE,
ELI SAULSBURY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. G. DONNAN,
CHAS. CLAYTON,
A. M. WADDELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is Raymond's report on mining statistics. The House sent over a resolution to print seven thousand copies and a similar resolution to print seven thousand copies of the report of next year—covering two years. The report is one year behind. The Senate have reduced the number to four thousand for each, giving to the Senate in each case a thousand copies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1339) to abolish the consulate at Amoor River and establish a consulate at Vladivostock, Russia, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask what is the regular order of business this morning?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is in order, and the Senator from Michigan, from the Committee on Commerce, is entitled to the rest of the morning hour, and has moved to take up a bill, and the bill has been taken up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was under the impression that the morning belonged to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was informed by the Secretary that it belonged to the Committee on Commerce, and the Senator from Michigan claimed the floor. The Chair now learns that he was misinformed, and that the Committee on Appropriations is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Michigan is so enterprising that he needs watching. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Appropriations is entitled to the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Monday will be a very proper day for my friend from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe Senate bill No. 1339 is now before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate on a motion to take it up made under a misunderstanding as to the committee entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to yield to this one bill if it takes no time.

Mr. LEWIS. I object myself. Let the committees take their order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the Chair must say that the Committee on Appropriations has the rest of the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will not object to passing this bill if it takes no time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Committee on Appropriations desire to occupy this morning hour?

Mr. LEWIS. If that bill is to be taken up and to exclude all others and we are to go on with the business of the Committee on Appropriations, I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the further consideration of the bill, and the Chair will suggest to the Senator from Michigan that the Committee on Appropriations claim the rest of this morning hour and the Committee on Commerce will have the next morning.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was informed that the Committee on Appropriations did not desire this morning hour, and therefore I supposed, the Committee on Commerce being next, the hour would fall to me.

Mr. SARGENT. There are several bills which the Committee on Appropriations desire to present for the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Appropriations has the floor.

BRANCH MINT AT THE WEST.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he will allow a resolution which is intended to procure information merely to be considered. I think it will only take one minute to read it. It is reported from the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the following resolution was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That, as it appears expedient to establish a branch mint for the coinage of silver, the President of the United States be requested to institute inquiries as to the proper place for the establishment of a branch mint at some point in the Western States, or in the Mississippi Valley, taking into account all questions of economy and facilities of distribution, and report upon the same at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

EMIGRATION TO LIBERIA.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the petition of John James Flournoy, a citizen of Georgia, praying for an appropriation of money to aid such colored persons as may desire to emigrate to Liberia, have had the same under consideration and ask to be discharged from its futher consideration. The committee is a little in doubt as to what committee the matter would properly belong. It has been suggested that it belongs to the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and it may be that it should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We are uncertain about it. At any rate we ask to be discharged.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps it ought to go to another committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps the Committee on Military Affairs, I would suggest to my friend from Illinois.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

PAYMENT OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred a bill providing for the payment of certain employés of the House of Representatives, to report it back with amendments and ask its passage.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4730) providing for the payment of certain employés of the House of Representatives was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 15 to strike out the word "six" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

For the pay of seven folders from July 1, 1874, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 17, to strike out "$3,400" and to insert in lieu thereof "$3,966.66."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CONSULATE CERTIFICATES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3907) repealing section 3 of the act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government, and for other purposes, approved February 22, 1873, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of the consular officers of the United States hereafter to inspect goods, wares, and merchandise offered for certificate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I desire to understand that bill. I could not concur with the committee in recommending the passage of the bill, and I should like to ask from the chairman of the committee an explanation of the bill as he understands it. I must say, after consulting the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that neither of those Senators seem to desire the passage of the bill or in fact to understand its rather incomprehensible provisions. If the effect of this bill is to lop off the present restraints upon smuggling across the frontier, then by all means it ought not to pass.

It is very well known that by recent legislation of Congress we have provided for imports in bond being sent across railroad-routes and steamship-routes and made interior points ports of entry, so to speak, by which, without the greatest precautions on the part of the Government, frauds are committed on the revenue. In some investigations which were made by the Committee on Appropriations early in this session, or rather before the session commenced, under a special order of the Senate, incidentally the question came up as to the amount of revenue which the Government could rely upon to pay its current expenses, and we were somewhat surprised by the statement that the revenues were falling off largely, not merely on account of a reduction of duties or on account of the still continuing effects of the panic, but because recent legislation had taken down guards before that time existing by which smuggling was prevented, and one thing that was instanced among others was that there was such facility for getting goods with the duties unpaid across the frontier that from a million to two million dollars was lost to the Treasury by means of that legislation.

If the effect of this bill, which I must say nobody seems to understand and which I have not yet heard satisfactorily explained by the Committee on Appropriations, is to still further relax these guards, I am decidedly opposed to the bill. But if it is to have the effect, which I cannot see, of more stringent guards to the Treasury, I am in favor of it. I believe a great mistake was made in our legislation on moieties last year. I believe it has cost the Treasury $23,000,000 this year, and will cost that amount or a greater amount year by year until the experience of mankind and the experience of this Government for a great many years is allowed to prevail and we revert to some system by which we can use detectives to protect the revenues. I had some forebodings at the time that bill passed. I expressed them upon the floor of the Senate. I did not believe that the merchants, although honorable in their business, who pay the duties are right advisers of the Government as to the means which should be used for the detection of fraud, because under the honorable name of merchant there may be concealed many a knave and unquestionably is concealed many a man whose principal profit is in plundering the Treasury and defrauding it of its just dues. I believe that the whole legislation was passed through in haste and was ill conceived. But the provision which is now proposed to be repealed was put upon an appropriation bill, probably some Senator rising in his place and urging it at the moment, and others yielding and it passing, and we come in now with late repentance to take off that provision from the appropriation bill.

I find that the sundry civil bill this year is in danger of being loaded down with all kinds of miscellaneous amendments reforming or deforming nearly all the laws on the statute-book; that it is to be made in fact a system of revision of the laws of the United States, statutes which we submitted to a commission that sat for several years and then passed through two committees of Congress and both Houses only to find it burdened with errata. Now, to attempt the same thing even in a limited degree on the sundry civil bill, and it is attempted there, is most dangerous legislation, and I desire most strenuously to oppose it at this time, before the Committee on Appropriations have passed upon the multiform amendments sent to them. I most earnestly protest against the system, and I state now that I am ready, unless a most serious exigency is shown, to resist these amendments to the end.

Recurring again to my question to the chairman of the committee, I desire to know what is the meaning of repealing that clause. Is it to take off the guards which we have against smuggling across the frontiers, or will it have that tendency, or is it in the other direction? I must confess I cannot see.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In reply to the Senator from California, who asks me something about this provision, I have to say that I know but very little except what I learn from the transactions that come to us from the other House. I agree with the Senator that it is not good practice to make these radical amendments touching the general service of the country upon appropriation bills, and every session of Congress we have more or less to do with rectifying the errors obviously committed by hasty legislation and immature legislation adopted in that way, legislation which has not come from any committee and which sometimes the Committee on Appropriations are ill-prepared to resist. This may be one of those cases, but I have been rather persuaded that it is not one of those cases where the legislation was hasty. I will read the statute which is repealed by this bill; it is an independent section upon the diplomatic and consular bill of 1873:

SEC. 3. That no consular officer of the United States shall hereafter grant a certificate for goods, wares, or merchandise shipped from countries adjacent to the United States, which have passed a consulate after purchase for shipment.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I should like to inquire whether that does not mean that if a consulate in Canada or some other consulate shall have passed the goods, when they arrive at the frontier, it does not take away all power of our consul, stationed at the point where they are to pass over into the United States, to re-examine the invoice or ascertain what the packages contain?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I will show my understanding of the true condition of things. In the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill which passed in 1873 was the provision which I have read. I find this explanation of the matter:

The object of the provision at the time of its adoption was, as I understand it, to compel the purchases made of goods or animals in Canada for shipment to the United States to be entered at the first consulate which they might reach.

The bill was passed undoubtedly for the purpose of increasing consular fees at interior consulates in Canada, and at the instance of those consuls, especially at the instance of the consul at Toronto. It has proved in practice very inconvenient to persons shipping goods from Canada, especially persons going into Canada to purchase animals to bring into the United States, as it might require them to enter for certificate any animals they might purchase at the first consulate they might reach. And as they might buy some at one place and others at another, they might be obliged to obtain half a dozen certificates for what was really one purchase.

This matter was brought to the attention of the Committee on Foreign Affairs by a petition signed largely by shipping merchants of Buffalo; and the attention of the committee was also called to it further by the gentleman who represented the Buffalo district [Mr. BASS] as a matter of great inconvenience to shippers, and as resulting in no advantage to the Government. The committee were unable to see how the Government could possibly derive any advantage, although the provision might give some little local advantage to consuls. Therefore they have recommended the repeal of that provision.

That was the statement in the House of Representatives. I think therefore the Senator will see that it does create a very great embarrassment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to what I understand to have been the reason of the passage of the law which it is now proposed to repeal. Under the former law purchasers of lumber or cattle or any article in the Canadas, instead of taking out a consular certifiate at the place of purchase or at the consulate nearest to the place of purchase, would wait until they reached the border line, where it was impossible for the consular agents to know anything about the articles, about the price paid for them, or their value. This law was passed two years ago to remedy that evil. I do not know but that in the practical operation of the law there may have a greater evil sprung up, but I doubt it. I think, therefore, this is a bill that requires further and more special investigation before it shall be allowed to pass. It will be obvious to any one that an article might be purchased at Montreal where the value of it was well known, and yet when it reached Rouse's Point the consular agent might not know anything about the real value of the article, and so in at least a dozen other instances all along the line of the border. The precise object was under the old law to get at the real value at the place nearest to the first shipment of the article, and not wait for a mere boy or some consular agent at the line to give a certificate of the value of articles they do not know anything at all about.

Mr. SCOTT. The remarks of the Senator from Vermont prompt me to make an inquiry as to the practical operation of this bill. As I understand it, the act of 1873 requires the consular certificate to be given at the first consulate where the purchased goods arrive. If that be repealed, the effect will be that goods purchased in Canada, for instance, at the Suspension Bridge, may travel all through Canada on the railroad and take a consular certificate when they get opposite Detroit, hundreds of miles away. I should like to have from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who is asking the passage of this bill, an explanation of what effect that is to have on the revenues, what facilities it will give for undervaluation, &c.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course I am unable to say how that might be, but that it operates as a practical inconvenience to trade is most obvious. It requires people going into the interior of Canada and purchasing, as I have already read, to get certificates at all these places.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the Chair calls up the bill to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights, on which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope we shall be allowed to have a vote on this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not think there can be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator to let it go to the Committee on Commerce. I have some doubt about the operation of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; let it take that reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 134) for the relief of Daniel S. Mershon, jr.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Lowell A. Chamberlain, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON of Texas, Mr. MERRIMOM, Mr. SCHURZ, Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. STEWART submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. L. P. LUCKY, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 769) for the relief of Major J. W. Nichols, paymaster United States Army; and

An act (S. No. 1055) for the relief of J. W. Drew, late additional paymaster in the United States Army.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights, the question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to strike out of the fourth section of the bill the words "or of any State."

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand the Senator from Maryland is willing to yield for a few minutes that I may speak on this bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Very well.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress I voted against a bill similar to the civil-rights bill now under consideration. After thoroughly reconsidering the subject I am compelled to vote against this bill also; and, considering its importance, politically and otherwise, I am not willing at this time, just as I am to leave the Senate, to record my vote against a bill which is supported by so many of my political associates, without also putting upon the record the reasons that compel me to give that vote. I shall do this very briefly and rather in the form of an opinion than an argument. I shall make no attempt to inflame passions or antagonize anybody's arguments beyond a statement, as clear and brief as I can make it, of the reasons which compel me to vote against this bill.

I entertain, as strongly as any Senator, the sentiments which have inspired this bill; and in the present unhappy condition of the South, I would go to the extreme limit of our constitutional power to support any bill calculated to protect the colored people of the South or to restore order in that distracted section. But I cannot go beyond the limits of the Constitution.

Four millions of human beings, who were held in slavery at the commencement of the late civil war, have been emancipated and made citizens of the United States, and of the States in which they reside. This great and sudden change in the social condition of the States where slavery existed has created discontent, and inflamed the prejudice of those who belonged to the dominant race against their former slaves lately raised to legal and political equality. This bill is intended to repress all manifestations of this prejudice, and to secure to the colored man the rights he ought to enjoy. If it could go upon the statute-book and accomplish a complete eradication of the deep and long-existing prejudice of the white race against social contact with the race in whose favor it is proposed, it would be a signal triumph of humanity. And in the history of the colored race since the beginning of the war there is abundant reason for the desire to create, in lieu of this prejudice, a feeling of fraternity between the two races.

During the war these people guarded the property, the homes, the wives and children, of those who were away battling for southern independence—an independence sought to perpetuate the unjust system of which the colored people were for more than two centuries the subjects. Such loyalty has no parallel in history. And since the termination of those four years of bloody strife, under the various disadvantages consequent upon long-continued bondage, and their sudden deliverance from it and advancement to the dignity of absolute freedom, these people have manifested a degree of moderation and amiability, a thirst for knowledge, a desire for moral improvement, and a respect for law and order, which have excited the wonder, and gained for them the respect, of all reflecting and candid persons.

But haste is not always speed; and especially is this true of attempts to coerce sentiment or suppress prejudice. This can only be accomplished by time, kindly entreaty, reason, and argument. And all experience demonstrates that every unavailing attempt to force men into compliance with social, religious, or political dogmas has the effect to postpone the end desired. If this bill, when passed through the forms of enactment, should be declared unconstitutional and void, it would delay, not accelerate, the end desired. And there is no class of citizens who have so great an interest as colored citizens in preserving in full force every provision of the Constitution. Their rights are secured by that instrument, and against any infringement of its provisions they should be the first to protest.

The pervading philosophy of our institutions is that liberty can only be protected against the tendency of Government to encroach upon the rights of the people by a distribution of powers. Therefore certain powers are conferred upon the United States, and all others are reserved to the States; and the powers of the Union and of the States are subdivided and distributed among the several departments of which the respective governments are composed. A citizen of the Union residing in a State owes a double allegiance and is entitled to the protection of both governments. As a citizen of the United States he owes them certain duties, and is entitled to claim from them protection of the rights and privileges which pertain to him in his character as a citizen of the Union. He also owes duties to the State, and is entitled to its protection as regards the rights and privileges which pertain to him as a citizen of the State. For instance, a citizen of the United States engaged in foreign commerce, or in commerce among the several States, or with the Indian tribes, is entitled, as respects that business, to the protection and subject to the control of the United States; while a citizen engaged in commerce between two places in a State is in that behalf entirely beyond the power of Congress, but is subject to the power of the State and entitled to its protection.

One provision of this bill declares that certain persons shall be entitled to equal accommodations and facilities of public conveyance on land or water. This might be sustained as a regulation of commerce if confined to that commerce over which Congress possesses the power of regulation—commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, or with the Indian tribes. But the bill does not purport to be a regulation of the particular branches of commerce over which Congress has control. It applies to every person or corporation engaged in transportation from point to point within a State as well as to those engaged in transportation among the several States.

It is well settled that no act of Congress can be valid under the Constitution unless it can fairly be referred to some head of Federal jurisdiction. For instance, in regulating commerce among the States, Congress might provide that every person engaged in such commerce should be entitled to the accommodation of inns in the several States through which he might pass in the prosecution of his business; and perhaps, upon the theory that a cheerful mind is favorable to enterprise, might provide that he should be admitted to theaters and other places of public amusement in the States wherein he might be temporarily sojourning during the transaction of his business. Such provision in regard to theaters would be somewhat fantastic as a regulation of commerce; and yet, if Congress saw fit so to provide, such provision might be sustained as relating to a subject over which Congress has jurisdiction. But the bill under consideration does not rest upon this ground, because its provisions are not confined to persons engaged in such commerce.

It becomes necessary, therefore, in order to maintain the constitutionality of this bill, to select some other head of Federal jurisdiction to which it may fairly be referred. And I understand that its constitutionality is maintained upon the ground that it is within the powers conferred upon Congress by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution.

This amendment provides—

1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

2. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

3. Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

4. Nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

These are the only provisions of the fourteenth amendment which are claimed by any one to justify this bill.

It is manifest that the fourth clause, that "no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," has no application to this subject, especially to the jury clause of this bill. It is equally evident that the third clause, "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," has no such application.

This is evident from the fact that women and infants are citizens of the United States, and the fact that they are excluded from serving as jurors in every State in the Union, and the fact that no one pretends or claims that, in consequence of such ineligibility, they are deprived of life, liberty, or property, or of the equal protection of the laws. If the ground maintained yesterday by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that these provisions of the fourteenth amendment require that colored persons should be eligible to serve as jurors in State courts is correct, then this bill ought to be so amended as to provide that women and babes at the breast should be so eligible; because they are persons equally with colored citizens entitled under these two clauses of the amendment to everything secured to colored citizens.

If this bill can be maintained at all, it must be under the second clause:

No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

The phraseology of this section of the amendment merits critical examination. It provides that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

The phraseology of the next clause is essentially different:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

It will be seen that this amendment does not, in words, forbid States to abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the State. To make the two clauses equally comprehensive, the latter should read thus: No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or of such State. But the words "or of such State" are not found in the second clause, and the variation in phraseology is so material that it must be considered intentional. Therefore it has been declared that the privileges and immunities which a State may not abridge are those which pertain to citizens of the United States as such.

In 16 Wallace's Reports, page 74, the Supreme Court of the United States declare that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established by this amendment; and that the rights which belong to a citizen of the United States, as such, are protected by this amendment; while the rights of the same person, which pertain to him in virtue of his State citizenship, are not protected by the amendment, but remain under the protection and control of the State government only. The language of the court is:

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment. If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The court also say that with a few exceptions, such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts, "the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lies within the constitutional and legislative powers of the States, and without that of the Federal Government;" and the court hold that the fourteenth amendment makes no alteration in this particular.

Whether the opinion of the Supreme Court construing the Constitution be binding upon the other departments of the Government, is a question which has been much discussed. On one side it has been claimed that the Supreme Court is the authoritative expounder of the Constitution; and that what they hold it to be it is. On the other side it has been said that Congress and the Executive are equally entitled to construe the Constitution in regard to matters falling within their respective jurisdictions; and that the three departments being co-ordinate the court can no more bind Congress or the Executive, than Congress or the Executive can bind the court. But it is admitted on all hands that the Supreme Court, acting upon matters within its jurisdiction, that is, when determining causes, is supreme, and that all inferior courts of the Union are bound to observe its decisions.

I need not remark upon this difference in theory, because, conceding that Congress may pass a law and provide for its execution without the aid of the courts—where it can be so executed—which law the courts would hold to be unconstitutional; as for instance if the Supreme Court should decide that Congress had no power to appropriate money to carry on internal improvements, Congress might appropriate money and appoint the agents for administering the funds; yet this bill looks to the courts for its enforcement, and in the nature of things could provide no other instrumentality for its execution. Therefore this bill, should it pass through all the forms of enactment, would be a dead letter unless the rights it is intended to vindicate pertain to Federal citizenship as distinguished from those which pertain to citizenship of a State.

Let us examine this bill with reference to this principle established by the highest judicial tribunal of the Union.

This bill is entitled—

An act to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

But the first section provides, not that all citizens, but—

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

If the phrase "within the jurisdiction of the United States" means the same thing as "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," then the bill does not provide for Indians living in tribal relations with the United States, but does provide for stray bands of savages, not living in tribal relations, Chinamen, and all unnaturalized foreigners found within the United States.

Now, if it were admitted that Congress might provide that all citizens of the United States should be entertained at inns and amused at theaters, upon what ground can Congress justify entering within the lines of a State to provide for the entertainment and recreation of persons who are neither citizens of the United States nor of the State? And still more difficult must it be to maintain that the right which this act is intended to protect is a right which pertains to citizenship of the United States, when the person whose right is protected is not a citizen of the United States. But, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, no right can be protected by act of Congress except a right which pertains to a citizen of the United States as such citizen. And hence it follows that an attempt on the part of Congress to make such a provision on behalf of stray bands of savages and unnaturalized foreigners, as this bill attempts, is without any constitutional warrant whatever.

But, passing the objection as to the persons intended to be benefited, let the rights which are intended to be secured by this bill be examined with a view to determine whether they are rights belonging to the individual in his character as citizen of the United States as distinguished from his rights as a citizen of a State.

The first provision relates to inns, and includes every case in which any citizen of New York, for instance, shall apply for accommodations at an inn in that State. As before remarked, it may be that under the power to regulate commerce among the several States Congress might provide that a citizen going from one State into another, in the prosecution of commerce, should, while so engaged, be entertained in the inns of the latter State. But suppose a citizen of New York, residing in Albany, goes to New York city to buy goods to be shipped to him at Albany. In doing so he is engaged in commerce wholly within that State. Can it be said that he is so engaged in virtue of his citizenship of the United States? Over such commerce Congress has no control; and in prosecuting such commerce it would seem that such person would be exercising no right other than pertains to citizens of that State.

Take the case of theaters; and suppose a citizen of the State of New York, residing in the city of New York, applies for admission into a theater of that city. In doing so is he exercising a right which pertains to him as a citizen of the United States, as contradistinguished from his rights as a citizen of the State of New York?

As to common carriers, as I have before said, the provisions of this bill might be sustained, if confined to persons engaged in such commerce as is subject to the jurisdiction of Congress. But it is manifest that the provisions of the bill are not so restricted. The bill covers a case of transportation between New York and Albany as well as a case of transportation between New Orleans and New York. And the bill is clearly void as to all interstate transportation of persons and freight.

The fourth section of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the causes aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

There is no doubt of the power of Congress to provide who shall be eligible to serve as jurors in a Federal court, and it has already declared that colored men shall be so eligible. But has Congress power to provide who shall be eligible to serve as jurors in a State court? Let it be borne in mind that it is not the object of this provision to secure to citizens of the United States a right of trial before a jury constituted in a particular way; but to secure to citizens of the United States the right to serve as jurors in a State court in the trial of citizens or inhabitants of a State. The Supreme Court of the United States, in 16 Wallace's Reports, page 138, decided that a citizen of the United States, as such, was not entitled to practice as an attorney in courts of a State. And speaking of the fourteenth amendment as affecting this question, the court say:

In regard to that amendment, counsel for the plaintiff in this court truly says that there are certain privileges and immunities which belong to a citizen of the United States as such; otherwise it would be nonsense for the fourteenth amendment to prohibit a State from abridging them; and he proceeds to argue that admission to the bar of a State of a person who possesses the requisite learning and character is one of those rights which a State may not deny. In this latter proposition we are not able to concur with counsel. We agree with him that there are privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States in that relation and character, and that it is these and these alone which a State is forbidden to abridge. But the right to admission to practice in the courts of a State is not one of these. This right in no sense depends upon citizenship of the United States. * *

But on whatever basis this right may be placed, so far as it can have any relation to citizenship at all, it would seem that, as to the courts of a State, it would relate to citizenship of the State, and as to Federal courts it would relate to citizenship of the United States.

If it be not a right of a citizen of the United States as such to be admitted to practice law in a State court, which is a mere profession and occupation practiced for his own personal profit, involving no official connection with the Government beyond subordination to the orders and discipline of the court, upon what ground can it be maintained that it is the right of a citizen of the United States as such to sit in a jury of a State court? Juries in State courts perform a most important function in the administration of justice by the State government.

It will be seen that the decision to which I have referred goes far beyond what I am claiming here, because this was the case of a person applying merely to practice law, that is, to exercise and practice his vocation and calling. I argued that case for the applicant, and I attempted to establish the proposition that the Constitution of the United States guaranteed to them the right to practice all lawful professions, and therefore an attorney being a citizen of the United States might claim that privilege as a citizen of the United States everywhere; but the court, as courts sometimes do, rejected the argument which I urged upon them.

If the right to serve as juror in the courts of the State of Massachusetts, for instance, were a right which pertained to a citizen of the United States, as such, then it would follow that a citizen of the United States residing in the State of New York or California would have as much right to serve as a juror in the courts of Massachusetts as a citizen of the United States residing in that State.

Whatever right is inherent in the citizen of the United States as such he carries with him, without regard to State lines; he has the same right in California and in New York. Every right which pertains to citizenship of the Union may be exercised throughout the Union; and yet it would not be pretended that a citizen residing in California had any right to serve in a jury in the State of Massachusetts. And the fact that Massachusetts has a right to require that her jurors shall be of her own citizens shows that such service pertains to citizenship of that State, and not to citizenship of the United States. I presume no one will pretend that Congress could pass a law requiring the State of Massachusetts to select her jurymen from the whole body of citizens of the United States. And yet such law would be valid if the right to serve as a juror in Massachusetts were a right pertaining to a citizen of the United States as such.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] maintains that a person would be denied the equal protection of the laws if he were denied the right to serve on a jury. If excluding a person from the administration of justice be a denial to him of the equal protection of the laws, as that Senator claims, would not the same consequence follow from his exclusion from the Legislature which makes the laws and from the bench which construes them? It must be "every person," because the clause which he refers to is not confined to "citizens." It relates to any person. A roaming vagabond Indian, John Chinaman in his wooden shoes, an unnaturalized foreigner just landed on the dock in Boston, is "a person" protected by that provision in the Constitution to which the Senator referred; and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] suggests convicts in the penitentiary are also persons; but they are pretty well protected as a general thing. [Laughter.]

And if the Senator's argument establishes the right of every person in the State to serve as a juror, is it not manifest that it also establishes his right to participate in making and construing the laws? And yet it is well known that in proposing the fifteenth amendment, which secures to every citizen the right to vote, Congress purposely excluded the right to hold office. The Senator from Indiana maintains that no man enjoys the protection of the laws unless he be allowed to serve as a juror.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator will allow me to say I made no such statement——

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator wait until I get through, and then I will answer any question.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

Mr. CARPENTER. I can conceive of no argument based upon the fourteenth amendment establishing the right to serve as a juror which does not also establish the right to serve in the Legislature and hold any State office. And this, in view of the fifteenth amendment, must be regarded as a perfect reductio ad absurdum.

If the States do not possess the power of determining who shall and who shall not participate in the exercise of this important State function, then it must be admitted that the States may be interfered with in an important particular in the exercise of their conceded powers.

No one will deny that to-day, after all the amendments, a State has a right to administer justice, according to her own constitution and laws, in obedience to the Constitution of the United States, in her own courts. This is her prerogative. The States cannot interfere with the exercise of Federal functions, by taxing the instrumentalities or officers of the General Government without its consent or in any other manner; and hence it follows that the United States cannot interfere with the States in the exercise of their functions. In accordance with this principle it was decided by the Supreme Court, in 11 Wallace's Reports, page 113, that Congress could not impose a tax upon the salary of a judicial officer of a State.

It seems to be clear from the decision of the Supreme Court in 16 Wallace's Reports, page 138, that the right of any person to serve as a juror in a State court is a right which pertains to him in his character of State citizenship, and does not belong to him as a citizen of the United States.

It results, therefore, that all of the provisions of this bill are in conflict with the Constitution of the United States as expounded by the Supreme Court. It may be said that these decisions are incorrect. If this were conceded, still it must be admitted that the decisions exist, and that they prescribe for the judicial department of the Government a rule which must be applied to this bill, and under which the courts must hold it to be invalid and void. And of what advantage can it be to the colored citizen to declare that he may bring a suit in which it is certain that he cannot recover; a suit which must be attended with vexation and expense, and result in defeat and disappointment?

Several years ago some humorous papers were published in this city, describing among other things the country residence of a gentleman of wealth and leisure. They described his magnificent mansion and floral garden on the banks of the Hudson, and the incident of his neighbor's hogs breaking into his garden and destroying everything. Intending to ridicule the technicalities of an old barrister, the writer relates that he consulted him in regard to this injury. He says:

> I asked him if I could not maintain an action of replevin for the hogs in the circuit court of the United States. He replied, with great solemnity, that under the Constitution of the United States and the practice of the courts such an action could be commenced. I asked him if I could recover. He said I could not.

This bill is framed according to the advice thus given. The colored citizen is authorized to bring a suit in which everybody knows he cannot recover. The Supreme Court of the United States, in two well-considered decisions, have settled principles upon which the validity of this bill must be denied; and every circuit court in which a suit may be commenced under its provisions will be compelled in proper judicial subordination to rule against a recovery. Its only effect, therefore, will be to involve the colored man in litigation in which he is certain to be defeated; "keeping the promise to his ear, and breaking it to his hope."

From the consideration which I have briefly stated, I am compelled to vote against the bill. I can understand how an orator like the Senator from Indiana could inflame the passions of a popular assembly, and rally it to support the provisions of this bill; but I confess my astonishment and my sorrow that he can carry along with him the highest court of the land—the Senate of the United States—and pass this bill through all the forms of enactment. I am consoled, however, by the confidence that, if it shall become a law, the judicial courts will intervene to vindicate the Constitution.

Mr. MORTON. I understood my friend to say that I took the position yesterday that under the fourteenth amendment every man was entitled to sit upon a jury, or, if not, he was denied the equal protection of the laws. I did not say that, nor did I intend to say it. What I said and that which I maintain is, that so far as the fourteenth amendment is concerned the States may prescribe whatever qualifications they choose for the right to sit upon a jury; they may require such qualifications as their constitutions may allow them to do; but they cannot require qualifications of one man which they deny to another; that if they say a man twenty-one years old, a voter, who has been a resident of the State for one year is qualified to sit upon a jury if he is a white man, they cannot deny that to a colored man having those qualifications. In other words, I say that whatever qualifications or restrictions are applicable to the one must be applicable to the other; that to give the exclusive right to white men to sit upon juries and to adjudicate upon the rights of colored men is denying to colored men the equal protection of the laws, because it is placing the adjudication of their rights exclusively in the hands of another race, filled with a prejudice and passion in many States that would prevent them from doing justice. Formerly in England Jews were not allowed to sit upon juries because of their religious faith. Will any one deny, looking back to the history of England and the persecutions inflicted upon the Jews, the great wrongs they suffered in the courts? Will anybody deny that that was denying to the Jews the equal protection of the laws of England?

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him in turn? I understand the Senator now to have come back precisely to the ground which I understood him to maintain yesterday, that the Jew was not enjoying the equal protection of the laws because he could not sit upon a jury.

Mr. MORTON. Because having qualifications of other men who were allowed to sit upon juries he was not allowed. That is the point. I do not think——

Mr. CARPENTER. Precisely. Therefore, if my friend will pardon me, he is on the precise ground I supposed he was—that denying to a man or to a class of men the right to serve in the jury-box is denying them the equal protection of the laws. That is the Senator's position.

Mr. MORTON. Having the qualifications required of other men.

Mr. CARPENTER. Exactly; but the denial of the equal protection of the laws results from the fact, and is the consequence of his being denied the right to serve in the jury-box; is that it?

Mr. MORTON. Having the qualification of other men who are allowed to serve.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I did not misunderstand the Senator's argument, certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I understood my friend to say that I contended that to deny a man the right to sit upon a jury was a violation of the fourteenth amendment. I said no such thing. What I meant was that there must be an equality in that right; that if I was allowed to sit upon a jury, being of age, having lived in the State the requisite length of time, to deny that also to a colored man of the same age and having lived in the State the same length of time was to make an inequality before the law and was denying to him the equal protection of the laws.

I simply want to make one remark about the history of this question as applied to the Jews in England. The adjudication of their rights was placed exclusively in the hands of the Christians, at that time bitterly prejudiced against the whole Jewish sect and persecuting them upon all occasions. If they had had the right to sit upon juries, then indeed they would have had, so far as that was concerned, the equal protection of the laws. My friend said that my position required babies at the breast to be authorized to sit upon juries. I do not know how to answer an argument of that kind. I do not know how to meet that; but if there is any force in it, I may be allowed to say that if you allow a white baby to be placed upon a jury and do not allow that to the black baby, you are thereby creating an inequality.

But what force is there in such an argument about minors when in all countries there are laws fixing the time when they shall come to their majority and exercise civil and political rights? That results as of necessity from nature. Consequently there is no force in an argument of that kiud. I come back to the simple proposition that in the State of South Carolina, with all the prejudice and passion of the whites against the colored men, to place the administration of the law exclusively in the hands of white men is to deny to colored men an equal protection of the laws. It is a proposition so clear that it seems to me no argument whatever can be made against it.

Mr. CARPENTER. One argument made against it is that the Senator from Indiana, when the proposition is put right to him, denies that he is in favor of any such proposition.

Mr. MORTON. O, no; I do not.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let us see. I have no disposition to get into any collision with the Senator from Indiana on this question; but as I made the remark that he had maintained a certain proposition, I will read from the report of his remarks yesterday what he actually said:

> Mr. MORTON. If the State of North Carolina by law provides that no man but a white man shall sit upon the jury, though it was to try a colored man for his life or to try his rights of property, I mean to say that the whole colored race of North Carolina does not enjoy the equal protection of the laws, and how any man of common sense can deny it I cannot understand.

The Senator was speaking of the fourteenth amendment. He was using the language of the fourteenth amendment which provides that no State shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, and he said that equal protection was denied to the colored man because he could not serve in the jury-box. Therefore I said, not meaning certainly to misrepresent him—and I certainly have not misrepresented him for he repeats the same thing to-day while charging me with misrepresenting him——

Mr. MORTON. No, I do not mean that.

Mr. CARPENTER. I said that the Senator maintained that to deny to colored men in North Carolina the right to serve in the jury-box is to deny them the equal protection of the laws—and so he did.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. His argument, as I understand him, is based upon the supposition, or at least his argument is calculated to make the impression upon the country, that this discrimination against which he inveighs actually exists by law. I want to ask that Senator or any other Senator what State in the South has passed such laws? Let him point to one law in any southern State which violates any provision of the fourteenth amendment. There is no law—and I say it without fear of successful contradiction—which denies any race the right to sit on juries or any other right that is accorded to any other race. So that even upon the supposition that the Congress could exercise this extraordinary supervision over juries of State courts, the Senator's argument is groundless.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if any colored men sit on juries in Georgia?

Mr. GORDON. I will answer the Senator by saying that any colored man can sit upon a jury in Georgia who has the requisite intelligence and is upright. These are the only qualifications requisite for jurors under the laws of Georgia. If the Congress of the United States is to undertake to alter the customs of drawing jurors, then we are to discuss another proposition entirely. I am speaking now of the laws; and if I understand the provisions of the fourteenth amendment, that amendment inhibits any State from passing laws denying to any citizens of the United States the immunities and privileges which belong to other citizens of the United States. Whenever a State passes such laws—laws denying to one class of citizens rights which are guaranteed by the Constitution to any other class of citizens, and I do not now stop to inquire what rights and immunities are granted or guaranteed by the Constitution—then I admit that under the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment Congress may proceed by appropriate legislation to protect that class of citizens so denied against such discrimination. Until that law is passed, however—until by statute a State denies some right which belongs to all citizens of the United States as citizens, not of a State but of the United States—until this is done, I maintain that Congress has no power under the fourteenth amendment to interfere. A State must not only have denied immunities, but such immunities as belong to citizens of the United States as such.

Mr. MORTON. One word. I understood the Senator from Georgia that if a State were to pass a law inhibiting colored men from sitting on juries then we could interfere to enforce the amendment. Now I ask him, that being true, have we not a right in advance to pass a law prohibiting and preventing the making of such a law. I should like to ask him whether as a matter of fact black men do sit on juries in Georgia?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is what I want to get at. I should like the Senator from Georgia to give me his attention for a moment. The Senator from Georgia says that in Georgia they allow no person to sit on a jury unless he is upright. It is a fact that no colored man has ever sat on a jury in Georgia, and who is the judge of his uprightness but the gentlemen who have the right to interpret this law? Why do they do it? Is it so that no colored man in Georgia is upright and honest and fit to sit on a jury? How do they get at this?

Mr. GORDON. Probably the Senator is better informed than I am about Georgia. I say that colored men have sat on juries in Georgia. He says they have not. There I leave it, and wish to reply to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the Senator from Georgia if any colored man has sat on a jury in Georgia under the State laws since the democrats have got control of Georgia?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President——

Mr. GORDON. If my friend from Maryland will allow me, I will answer that question to remove any apprehension which it may have created. I stated before that it had been done. The Senator repeats the question. I give him this fact, as I am informed of it, that in the court of Judge Schley, one of our circuit judges in Georgia, colored jurors were summoned not long since, and I believe sat upon the jury.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is he a republican or a democrat?

Mr. GORDON. He is a democrat of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana one question. A question has been put to my friend from Georgia by the Senator from South Carolina. Permit me to ask the honorable Senator from Indiana if colored men sit on the juries in Indiana?

Mr. MORTON. Have they the right to sit on juries?

Mr. EATON. I did not ask that question. I ask are they placed upon the jury in Indiana?

Mr. MORTON. I understand they are.

Mr. EATON. Where and when?

Mr. MORTON. I have not been there to practice law for some years; I have not been in a court-house in Indiana for some years; but that is my understanding.

Mr. EATON. The Senator will permit me to say that I think not.

Mr. MORTON. Is the Senator prepared to contradict it?

Mr. EATON. Would the passage of this law give the negro the slightest benefit in an attempt to be placed in a jury-box in Indiana?

Mr. MORTON. I should think it would if he is not allowed that privilege already.

Mr. EATON. How? Permit me, Mr. President—take my own State of Connecticut for illustration. How are jurors drawn there? The civil authority of each town within the limits of the State, composed of its selectmen, its justices of the peace, and its constables, meet to appoint the jurors under the constitution of Connecticut. They select the men, white or black; and the passage of this law and a hundred other laws here would not affect the rights of the constables, selectmen, and justices of the State of Connecticut to select such individuals as they pleased to serve upon the juries. Therefore if your law passes it is utterly useless under the State law and under the State constitution.

Mr. MORTON. May I be allowed to ask the Senator a question? He says it would make no difference, because they would not draw colored jurors.

Mr. EATON. I did not say that.

Mr. MORTON. Probably men of his political faith would not do it; but perhaps men of a different political faith would do it and would be disposed to do equality and justice in that respect. But if the law of the State confines the right to sit upon juries exclusively to white men, the sheriff or the constable has no right to draw colored men although a colored man may be on trial for his life or for his property, and the adjudication of his rights is by the law exclusively in the hands of white men, some of whom perhaps despise him and think he has no rights that they are bound to respect. And yet we are told that is giving to the colored man the equal protection of the laws. Why, Mr. President, I do not know how to argue against such a proposition as that.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Indiana ought not to misrepresent me. He does not intend to do it. At least I cannot suffer him to do it. He says that I said the proper officers would not draw colored men as jurors. I said no such thing. Far be it from me to say any such thing. I say this: that the passage of this law in itself would afford no power, would give them no benefit; they would still rely upon the good sense, the judgment, the kindness of the constables, the selectmen, and the grand jurors of every town within the limits of my Commonwealth.

Mr. MORTON. Is my friend right about that?

Mr. EATON. Yes; I am.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose that in his Commonwealth a sheriff is disposed to draw a colored man, summon him, and put him on a jury.

Mr. EATON. Allow me to say to the honorable Senator from Indiana that the sheriff has no power. That is not the way jurors are drawn in my State.

Mr. MORTON. That is a mere quibble. The question is as to the officer, whether sheriff, constable, or clerk of the court, being disposed to do it and act fairly, but the law of the State prevents him from doing it. If we pass this law, then that part of the State law which prevents him from doing it is overruled, and if the officer is disposed to act fairly he has the legal power to act fairly. That is the difference.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Indiana should not use the word "quibble."

Mr. MORTON. Perhaps not; but I thought it was that.

Mr. EATON. It is not a proper word to use here. I first stated the fact to the honorable Senator from Indiana that within the limits of my State, under its constitution and laws, a certain body of men in each town drew or named jurors. The sheriff has no power; the clerk of the court has no power; they are named by the civil authorities of the towns; and, as I said, you may pass a thousand laws here and you give no security at all by your law. The security is under the law of the State of Connecticut.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire the Senator from Connecticut to hear a question that I should like to put to him. As I understand him, in his State there is no law which would inhibit the drawing of jurors of any color.

Mr. EATON. None.

Mr. LOGAN. This law, then, would have no effect in his State at all, because the law of his State already corresponds with this law, as I understand.

Mr. EATON. I do not know that there is such a law in any State.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the point. If there is no law in his State which inhibits the drawing of jurors of any color, I ask him whether this law would affect the drawing of jurors in his State?

Mr. EATON. I said it would not. I said that a hundred such laws would not.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. Then the State of the Senator is not affected by this bill in any particular whatever. But suppose there is another State that is different, how then would it be?

Mr. EATON. Let me assure the honorable Senator from Illinois that I did not rise to discuss this question at this time; I simply rose to ask a question of the honorable Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood that; but I only wanted to see where that question would lead. So far as my own State is concerned there is no such law; in fact the word "white" does not occur in our constitution.

Mr. EATON. It does in mine.

Mr. LOGAN. Then you have a constitution that inhibits it.

Mr. EATON. The word "white" is in our constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. Then you do inhibit it in that State.

Mr. EATON. We do not regard the word "white" now. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. You do not regard that word. That is very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair will observe to the occupants of the galleries that it is against the rules of the Senate to express applause or give expression of feeling one way or another. The Sergeant-at-Arms will enforce the rules of the Senate and place sufficient force in the galleries to preserve order.

Mr. LOGAN. Now the point is this: if the constitution of the State of Connecticut has the word "white" in it, that constitution does deny the equal protection of the law and is in contravention of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Therefore a law of this kind, under the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States, is an absolute necessity for the protection of these people even in the Senator's own State; and under the provision of this fourteenth article, which declares that—it remands to Congress the very act that we are now engaged in attempting to pass, because it is contravened by the constitution of the State of Connecticut.

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article—

Mr. EATON. I will not argue that any further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DENNIS. Will my colleague yield to me to say a word? I may not have another opportunity on this question.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. DENNIS. Mr. President, I do not seek this occasion to make a speech. This matter has been thoroughly discussed. It is now well understood throughout the entire country. We have heard arguments pro and con, and the minds of all Senators are made up as to how they will vote. I merely rise to say why I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to it first on account of its unconstitutionality, as will be proved when it is presented, as it will be, before the Supreme Court. I am opposed to it again because it is calculated to injure that class of people which it is intended by its friends to benefit.

I know I speak the sentiment of a vast majority of my people when I say that they unhesitatingly oppose this bill in every mode and manner, and as a representative in part of them I here to-day utter my solemn protest against its adoption, and when the occasion arises I shall ask to record my vote against it.

[Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I should like to know from the Senator who has charge of this bill whether the time is to be extended. I wish to address the Senate, but the time has all been occupied by the Senator from Maryland until we are now within five minutes of the time fixed for the close of the general debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing would be more agreeable to me, so far as I am concerned; of course I cannot speak for the Senate or for the gentlemen on the other side; but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] has a subject which he very properly feels it to be his duty to bring to the attention of the Senate this afternoon when this bill is concluded, and any suggestion or arrangement that will be agreeable to him, after the notice that he has given, and agreeable to the gentlemen on the other side, will be agreeable to me, so that we do not lose the opportunity to finish this bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the time be extended.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has taken but little of the time of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is the first time I have ever asked the Senate to allow me time to speak.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks an extension of the time for one hour.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I could not hear what took place between the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Vermont. I do not know precisely what is the application now made to the Senate. My name was alluded to.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state that I asked the Senator from Vermont if the time could be extended for debate on this bill. The Senator from Vermont declined to consent to that. I now ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the time may be extended one hour so that I may be permitted to address the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. In the situation in which I am placed, having charge of proceedings this afternoon in regard to which some eight or ten Senators have notified me that they intend to make some remarks, I am compelled to insist upon proceeding in the order which was arranged yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to submit a motion that at five o'clock the Senate adjourn until half past seven.

Mr. LOGAN. Take a recess.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; to adjourn.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. At the close of the proceedings this afternoon to adjourn to half past seven.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at half past seven this evening.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

Several SENATORS. What does that mean?

Mr. SARGENT. I will explain. We hope to get the sundry civil bill from the House to-night. It is absolutely necessary to get it from the House to-night that it may be printed and submitted to the Senate on Monday; and the tax bill can be taken up to-night or this business be finished. Under that pressing necessity I make the motion.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope that motion will not prevail. My constituency feel a deep interest in the tax bill. I am on the Committee on Appropriations. I think the Senate had better adjourn in order to allow the Committee on Appropriations to consider the bill referred to by the Senator from California. I cannot take part in the discussion of the tax bill if I am required to be with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SARGENT. It is that very thing that we want to have to-morrow. I want to ask the Senator and the other members of the Committee on Appropriations to meet to-morrow afternoon to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill in order that we may be able to report it on Monday.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to have some understanding. If the Senator from South Carolina proceeds to address the Senate for an hour——

Mr. SPENCER. That has been objected to.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I have not a word to say on that. What I wish to understand on the subject of adjourning to-night is whether it is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to move the tax bill and keep us sitting all night and into to-morrow, treating Sunday as part of Saturday, or whether he proposes to adjourn from to-night to Sunday or to adjourn to Monday?

Mr. SHERMAN. The tax bill is under the charge of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and therefore I cannot speak for his management of it. I would not like to say what he may do. He is not here at the moment, but can be sent for. I think his purpose a day or two since was to call it up to-night; but it is within the power of the Senate. I do not want to say anything about it, because I have not charge of that bill.

Mr. CAMERON. It seems to me this is all irregular. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PATTERSON] moved that the time for taking this question should be extended one hour. Before that question is decided, we are discussing whether we shall adjourn now or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That question had been decided. Objection was made to the request. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from California, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. SARGENT. In order that we may receive the appropriation bill and have it referred or do other business.

Mr. BAYARD. I suggest to the Senator from California to alter his phraseology. If he desires to take a recess, that can be done in the discretion of the Senate, but an adjournment must be from one day to another.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator understands the sad business that is soon to be brought before the Senate. The usual form is to adjourn. Now, I want to limit the power of adjournment, so that we shall not lose the chance of getting the sundry civil bill to-night.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not object. I only wanted to understand the meaning of the phrase.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from California a moment. He speaks of the sundry civil appropriation bill. Has he any assurance whatever that it will come over to-night?

Mr. SARGENT. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House was just with me on a conference committee, and said he expected to get the bill here by half past eleven o'clock to-night. There is an assurance; and on that basis I made the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We must proceed with the understanding and submit the question on the pending amendment to the civil-rights bill, whatever it may be.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the pending question be postponed for an hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is contrary to the unanimous understanding.

Mr. CAMERON. It may be so. Now will the Senate listen to me for a moment. It is in order that the Senator from South Carolina may have an opportunity to make his remarks upon this subject. It is important to him that he should do so. It is only fair on our part that we should give him the opportunity. I have never heard such a request objected to before. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that we have waited for his comfort or convenience ten or twelve days for the motion which he will make when this question is disposed of, and I think he can wait, if it may be for twelve or twenty-four or forty hours yet. That which has been postponed for ten or twelve days cannot be injured by another day or two's postponement. I move that the Senator from South Corolina have the opportunity to make his remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is impossible to make any motion about it. Of course this unanimous understanding does not bind the Senator. The Senator from South Carolina has a right under the Constitution to stand up and speak now if he wishes to. It does not need any motion. No motion is in order to extend the time for an hour, because there is no rule about it. This bill is under debate; and if the Senator from South Carolina chooses to take the responsibility of speaking now—and I certainly shall not claim the floor against him—he can act for himself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that——

Mr. TIPTON. In case the Senate extend an hour's privilege to the Senator from South Carolina, I understand then the whole question is open and he can be replied to in three hours; and debate is to be unlimited hereafter.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. There is one consideration that should be borne in mind: that as far as my recollection extends the Senator from South Carolina has never asked the Senate to listen to him upon any question at length. I think the Senator from Nebraska, as well as some other Senators, has occupied a fair portion of the time of the Senate, and in courtesy it would seem that the Senate ought to defer to the wishes of the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the amendment to the fourth section of the bill proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under the understanding as to five minutes, debate on amendments, I wish to say a word about this jury amendment. The effect of the motion of the Senator from Ohio is to strike out that part of the jury clause, as it is called, which relates to jurors in State courts. I suppose he makes that motion on the ground that the bill as it now stands is unconstitutional; for I know, I cannot help knowing from having observed him here so long, that his heart moves out strongly in favor of equal rights and abolishing all distinctions among citizens. It always has. He and his party have shown it by their votes upon the constitutional amendments, although they were always against them; they have shown it by their votes on the civil-rights bill that Judge Trumbull first brought forward in 1866; they have shown it on subsequent bills, on reconstruction and everything; so that the objection must stand upon the Constitution.

Now, what is the matter about the Constitution? If a juryman is an officer of a State and holds a political office in the constitutional sense, there would be a great deal of force in the argument against interfering with jurors in State courts; but if a juror is not an officer in the legal and constitutional sense, but like a witness is a citizen called in on the spur of the moment to perform a particular duty, then that part of the argument which is opposed to this jury clause based upon the idea that it is an office, falls. It is enough to say on that question merely that in all the history of juries from the beginning of the jury trial a thousand years ago down to this day it has been reserved to this present time to discover that a juryman is an officer under the laws and constitution of any country. A juryman is a man; he is called in by the name of a man and not by the name of an official; and he is no more an officer than a witness is, not a bit; and if it be not constitutional to say that there shall be equal rights in respect to the calling of witnesses, then it must follow that there must be equal rights in the same degree in respect of the selection of jurors.

Almost everybody voted for the civil-rights bill of 1866. There were only nine or ten votes against it, perhaps less, and yet that said that every man, without respect of race or religion or whatever, should have a right to be a witness, should have a right to be a suitor, should have various other rights, and they should not be abridged or denied. Now it is said that a man has no right to stand equal with his fellow-citizens in respect of taking the chance under the law that he may be drawn as a juror because he is of a particular race or of a particular color; and the same argument would apply to religion, to nativity, to political opinion. If, therefore, the Constitution of the United States does not protect the equality of rights among citizens as it respects the privilege, if you call it a privilege, or the duty, if you call it a duty, of all citizens to serve upon juries, other things being equal, then every State has the right to say, and Congress has a right to say, notwithstanding the Constitution, that no Roman Catholic shall ever sit on a jury; that no Presbyterian shall ever sit on a jury; that no colored man shall ever bring suit in a State court; that no man of German nativity shall ever be authorized to stand up in a court of justice to defend his rights.

Why, Mr. President, "the thing won't do," to borrow a favorite phrase of the Senator from Ohio. If it can be made out that a juryman is an officer under the Constitution and the laws, then you can say under the fifteenth-amendment principle that the right to hold office is not guaranteed to all citizens alike. But as I say—and no man can question it upon the authority of history—there has never been a time in the history of jury trials when a juror was anything like an officer. He is no more than a witness, and the first jurors, let me say, were witnesses, and they were summoned because they knew about the matter to be tried. So that I have no difficulty in saying that if we have any scope at all upon this bill, which I shall by and by try to show, it covers a juror as well as anything else.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Vermont has with infinite skill dealt in generalities. He points out no clause of the Constitution that authorizes this provision in the bill. He deals simply in generalities, speaks about equality, that the Constitution secures equality before the law, and therefore it must necessarily be that there is a right upon the part of every individual to sit in a jury-box. Now, Mr. President, I should like him or anybody else to point out how it is that States may make discriminations upon one line of distinction, but that when it comes to the question of race no discrimination can be made at all. It is admitted that a State may make a discrimination upon the line of ignorance, of education, and that that is perfectly right. It is admitted that a State may make a line of discrimination of language and that that is perfectly legal. It is admitted that you may make a line of discrimination of property and say that a certain property qualification shall be necessary in order to entitle a person to be a juror, and that is all right. But it is said that when you come to the question of race, then you can make no discrimination at all.

Now, we are not on the question of whether such a discrimination is absurd or not. That is not here at all. We are not upon the question whether such a discrimination is unjust or not. That is not here at all. We are upon the question whether the Constitution forbids that discrimination while it permits all others. That is the question, and no man has been able to point out one word in the Constitution which says you shall make no discrimination on account of race but you may discriminate on any other account you see fit. That is the vice of the whole argument. Those who advocate this bill admit that you may discriminate; you may discriminate against those who are ignorant of the English language, against those who are ignorant of their own language, against those who have not sufficient property, you may discriminate against those who have not resided a particular time, against a particular sect; you may discriminate in regard to all these matters; but the moment you discriminate on the ground of race or color, that moment you transcend the Constitution of the United States and Congress is authorized to interfere. Sir, there is not one word in the Constitution that authorizes any such argument.

I believe I have one or two minutes yet. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] yesterday said that this was not a bill to prescribe the qualifications of jurors in a State court. Why, sir, if Congress can pass such a bill as this, it can prescribe completely the qualifications of jurors in a State court, for if it may forbid one discrimination by a State Legislature it may prohibit another, and thus by prohibition after prohibition it may make every person that it sees fit to say shall be a juror qualified to take a seat in the box; and, therefore, argue it as you may, this is a bill to prescribe the qualifications of jurors. You cannot get rid of it; for, as I said before, if you may eliminate one provision of a State statute on the subject, you may go on and eliminate another and another and another to the end of the chapter. No, sir; there is no concealing the fact that this is a direct invasion of the judicial power of a State, as direct an invasion as if you undertook to interfere with the judges upon the bench.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "or of any State;" so that the section, when amended, shall read:

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the causes aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If he were present, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Carpenter, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—40.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Fenton, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Johnston, Morrill of Maine, and Wadleigh—7.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of section 4:

That sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Senate have declared by their last vote that the right to sit upon a jury is one of those fundamental rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States that he cannot be deprived of on account of race, color, or persuasion, religious or political; and the bill professes to be "an act to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights." In 1862, while war was flagrant, the following act was passed, which still stands unrepealed upon our statute-book. Section 820 of the Revised Statutes contains this provision of the law of June 17, 1862:

SEC. 820. The following shall be causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, in addition to the causes existing by virtue of section 812, namely: Without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person whom the giver of such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; or to have counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

Mr. President, is it not plain that by this statute ninety-nine white men out of every hundred in the Southern States are disqualified from sitting on a jury, should the challenge be made for any one of these causes? There is not a boy who was eleven years old, incapable of arms-bearing, at the surrender of the last armed man of the late southern forces, who carried to his father in arms a cup of water, who did his bidding, who held his horse, who ministered to him in any way, who can serve on a jury. A man thoroughly devoted to the Union, stanchly upholding the claims of his country's government, may yet have performed some ordinary act of kindness to a neighbor who was of different political views and was engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States; and here in all this time not the men who were in arms, not the men who were capable of bearing arms at the time the war existed, but all these are to be excluded from the exercise and enjoyment of that which the Senate has declared no colored man whatever shall be excluded from. The Senate has declared that it is a fundamental right. It amounts, then, under the decision of the Senate, while this law stands upon the statute-book, to an absolute disfranchisement of 99 per cent. of the white population of the South. Section 821 provides:

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court in their discretion may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say that two years ago the House of Representatives passed a bill to repeal these two disqualifications, which ought long since to have been wiped from our statutes, and I earnestly trust that when the Senate is considering a measure of this kind, with the professions which the language of this bill contains, it will not hesitate at least to put the entire white population of the South on a level with the negroes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 4 the following words:

That sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT put the question on the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I would not say a word in reference to this amendment if it was a separate bill. I rise now merely to say that without discussing the propriety of repealing these two sections, whether they remain on the statute-books or not, it seems to me if there had been a very great desire on the part of some Senators to repeal these sections they might have brought the proposition before the Senate before, or at least it might have been brought before the Senate when this measure was considered by the Senate at the last session. It is perfectly obvious to all that if this bill is amended in the Senate that will be its defeat. That is the only thing I desire to say to our friends who support the bill, that in my judgment any amendment to this bill (which has been matured and which is a good bill) will be its defeat. For that reason, as far as I am concerned, I shall vote against all amendments without reference to whether it would be proper to repeal the sections indicated in the amendment or not. I will not say that I would not vote to repeal those two sections if the proposition was brought before the Senate as a separate bill. I think probably I would do so, but on this bill I certainly shall vote for no amendments, because the effect would be to defeat it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Fenton, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Johnston, Lewis, Sargent, Wadleigh, and West—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. I have an amendment to offer. I move after the word "pay" in line 7 of section 2 to insert the words "not more than." The provision now is:

That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action of debt, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year.

As this bill stands the penalty for the most trivial violation of this section cannot be less than $500. Now I say it is simply monstrous to enact a criminal code of that sort. The most trivial violation, which does not cause the person aggrieved one single cent of damages or one single moment of suffering, is made necessarily to inflict upon the aggressor the penalty of $500. Then the section itself is so comprehensive and at the same time so vague, that no man can tell how much he may be vexed under this section, to what extent the vexations may go, or what difficulties may be created by it. The language is: "That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen" these privileges. What is meant by "denying" to him these privileges? It is just about as vague as anything could well be. But it is not only that:

That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, * * * or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay, &c.

What is meant by "aiding or inciting such denial?" Any person who shall deny any of these privileges or anybody who shall aid or incite such denial is liable. No man can tell whether he is safe or not safe under the provisions of such a law as this; and to say that in every such case he shall be liable to pay $500 to the person aggrieved, although that person might not lose one single cent in money and not be subjected to any inconvenience whatsoever, or even to the suffering of a moment in his feelings, and also that there shall be a penalty of $500 is to my mind making a code of criminal law, not in the spirit of the enlightened age in which we live, but in the spirit of the cruelest and bloodiest age in which criminal laws ever were enacted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, we have five minutes on a side. I guess the Senator has had his five minutes.

Mr. THURMAN. Five minutes to a speaker.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Five minutes to a side; that is what it means. I will not take up my five minutes, however, in discussing that.

If the Senator from Ohio were before some petit jury in the city of Columbus, if he resides there, defending an American citizen for expelling an Irishman from his hotel because he was an Irishman, then his remarks might have some application as appealing to the sympathies and the prejudices of a jury who did not happen to like, as in know-nothing times, the Irish or any other foreign people; but for the Senator to stand up here and say that fixing $500 as the minimum punishment for a man who has been convicted by a jury, an impartial jury, and if this bill goes into effect a jury which may be composed of Irishmen and of Germans and of Englishmen and of Americans and of Africans—who has been convicted by such a jury of invading one of the fundamental rights of a citizen, that $500 is too much to pay, he must have an extraordinary view of the value of the rights of citizenship, a very extraordinary view indeed.

Now the Senator says this goes back to the cruel times of barbarism, &c. Does not the Senator know that if we look through the Revised Statutes there are a great many instances where the minimum punishment for offenses is fixed as high as $500? I cannot in five minutes take the time to run them over. It is a very simple proposition. The difficulty is that the Senators on the other side seem to fancy that the protection of the fundamental rights of citizenship is a mere joke, a trivial matter; and if a man's dearest rights are invaded upon the ground that he was born in one country or in another, or that he traces his lineage from one race or another, it is pretty hard to make the man who knowingly and willfully and maliciously invades such a right pay $500 for it.

Mr. MORTON. There are no rights but State rights to protect!

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are no rights but State rights that are to be invaded, and what State rights are nobody seems to know.

Mr. THURMAN. I think I have about one minute of my time unexpended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can proceed.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, what a commentary upon the speech just delivered by the Senator from Vermont is the fact that not ten minutes ago he voted to continue on our statute-book a provision that excludes nearly all the intelligence and the education of the South from the jury-box, the very juries that are to try these cases. The Senator says that after a man has been convicted of violating the fundamental principles of the Government by a jury impartially drawn, composed of Irishmen and Germans and Americans and negroes, and all that, certainly he ought to be punished by a fine of $500, and at the very same time the sound is hardly out of the Senate Chamber with which he expressed his negation of the repeal of the provision that ought to be repealed if you are to have any intelligent and upright juries at the South.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have I any time left, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has a minute and a half.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A minute and a half. That is plenty.

The distinction between the case we have and the one to which the Senator so feelingly refers is that the statute which we refused to repeal endeavors to make a jury-box pure and to keep out of it the people who are interested in the question to be decided; that if a man is accused of treason the jury-box shall not be filled up with his fellow-traitors; if a man is accused of being a conspirator, a Ku-Klux, that the jury-box shall not be filled up with his fellow Ku-Klux. On the Senator's argument, the true meaning of a jury would be, if a man is accused of anything, to send around everywhere and find somebody else who committed the same sort of crime to try him.

Mr. THURMAN. I have one word to say. The Senator's imputation is that every man in the South who was engaged in the late rebellion is a Ku-Klux and a traitor now. That is the imputation of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the Senator's opinion. I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not debate exhausted? We have spent five minutes on each side on an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that an order was made by the Senate to limit debate to five minutes on each side. If that be so, the Senator from Nebraska is not in order.

Mr. TIPTON. I move then to strike out the word "theaters" in the sixth line of the first section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That would not be in order, as an amendment is now pending. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. THURMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 22, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Thurman—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Washburn, West, and Windom—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Johnston, Lewis, Sargent, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. The amendment just voted down, if adopted, would have had the effect to make the sum of $500 the maximum penalty. As the bill stands the penalty is $500, without any regard to the difference in degree of criminality between different cases. The most trivial offense is punished by a penalty of $500. The most aggravated is punished by precisely the same penalty. If the law is constitutional there might be cases under it where ten times or twenty times $500 would be no greater penalty than ought to be inflicted; but this bill makes an iron rule which provides the same penalty in every possible case.

Now, to obviate that I move to amend by inserting after the word "pay" in the seventh line of the second section the words "not less than" instead of "not more than," as I proposed a moment ago, and then by striking out the word "hundred" in the eighth line; so that it will read, if the amendment be adopted:

For every such offense, forfeit and pay not less than the sum of five dollars, &c.

Leaving a greater sum to be recovered in case a greater penalty ought to be inflicted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is in substance the same amendment just voted down, is it not?

Mr. THURMAN. Not at all. If the amendment just voted on had been adopted, it would have been "not more than $500," and therefore you could not have exceeded that sum. I now propose to make five dollars the minimum. The Senator from Vermont can move any maximum he sees fit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think he will move any.

Mr. THURMAN. Some of my friends say we must have a limit if there is to be a penalty. I move to amend it then so as to read:

Not less than five nor more than one hundred dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This whole suggestion is totally unnecessary. This is substantially the same thing that we have just voted down, and I do not want to violate any understanding myself. But in respect to this recovery for private injuries, the statutes have had them in before; and now here is a favorite law, a favorite to the Senators on the other side, passed in 1850, which I happen to have open before me, which says that anybody who is convicted of being in any way connected with letting a colored man escape from service shall pay, by way of civil damages—"forfeit and pay to the party injured the sum of $1,000," absolutely and arbitrarily fixed. A thousand dollars may perhaps be in the minds of gentlemen a very moderate sum as the price of a slave; but when it comes to protecting the rights of freemen it is altogether too much to have it five dollars.

Mr. THURMAN. It is very easy to retort on the Senator that he has suddenly become in love with the fugitive-slave law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not. I am afraid such legislation as that was is the Senator's example.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. McCREERY. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, do not waste the time.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TIPTON. In the sixth line of the first section I move to strike out "theaters" and insert "churches."

Mr. President, this bill proceeds upon the assumption that the public will demands this legislation; and will the honorable Senator who has charge of the bill, or any other Senator, say to the country that there is a public opinion demanding that if a man is refused on account of color the accommodations, whatever they may be, that they have at a theater, or the advantages that may result from going to a theater, or the facilities for doing things that they have at a theater, or the privileges of a theater, it is a damage of $500? Do his constituents put such an estimate as that upon the advantages and accommodations that are furnished at theaters that they call upon him to impose a fine of $500 upon any man who deprives another of the privileges and accommodations of a theater? The honorable Senator goes to his constituents and to the country upon the basis that there is a public clamor among the virtuous people of this country that there must be a penalty of $500 imposed in order to secure to the African the accommodations that are said to belong to a theater. That is all the sheerest bosh. No man can vote for that honestly on this floor or anywhere else.

I therefore move that the word "theaters" be stricken out and that the word "churches" be substituted, in order that the penalty of $500 shall fall upon the man who is driven away from a church, where it is supposed that all men stand equal before the divine law; and of course such a body as this of intelligent, devoted Christian legislators will vote out the "theater" and vote in the "church."

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the Clerk to read the bill as it will stand if it shall be amended as proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The section will be reported as it would stand if amended.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in line 6 of section 1 to strike out the word "theaters" and insert "churches;" so that when amended that part of the section will read:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, churches, and other places of public amusement. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. THURMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall have the yeas and nays of course.

I avail myself, Mr. President, of this opportunity to say a few words—of course I cannot go into the argument in extenso—in support of this measure. It has seemed to me, in listening to the debate upon this and other measures which have become necessary from the course of events since 1860, that a very extraordinary consistency of attitude has been maintained by our friends on the other side of the Chamber and their predecessors. There has been no measure either for repressing rebellion, carrying on the war, securing the fruits of the war, that has found any favor with that party; and so I am not surprised that when we come now in some measure—not a large measure I am sorry to say, not a full measure I am sorry to say—but in some measure to protect the fundamental rights of citizens of the United States under its Constitution, we find the same party occupying its same old attitude.

We have been told in a delusive and false platform, gotten up at Cincinnati and indorsed without recourse at Baltimore or wherever the place was, that that party and its allies and new adherents were really going to accept what had transpired, and that they were in favor of the equal rights of all men before the law. But when you pass beyond that single instance of what I believe the whole country now knows to have been a false and delusive statement, I know of no instance in which that party and its allies have been in favor of taking a step either to preserve the integrity and unity of this people in its direst need or to maintain or observe the rights which the new amendments to the Constitution conferred. Why, look at it, Mr. President. Take the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery. Whose votes passed it after the war? At the end of the war, when everybody supposed that those who professed to be on the side of the country were opposed to the continuance of that institution, every democrat in this body I believe, on the 11th of April, 1864, voted against submitting to the people of the various States the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution providing for abolishing slavery. Why did they do it? They did it because they believed that slavery ought not to be abolished, and that the country ought to be remitted to the old condition of things; that the Southern States, having gone into rebellion, and being about to be defeated or having been defeated, should come back with everything—slavery and all—that they had fought to maintain and had failed to maintain. And when the thirteenth amendment was submitted to the States for their approval, I find that every democratic State, if I am not mistaken, which then had a democratic Legislature rejected that amendment—the States of Delaware and New Jersey and Kentucky. Why did they do it? They did it because they were determined that this Government should not take a step forward on the side of freedom and equal laws. They were determined that the old institution which had cursed not only those people in which it had lived but all the other people of this country should still stand in spite of all that had occurred.

And then again when we came to the fourteenth amendment, which I have heard no Senator on this floor upon the other side say a word in favor of, even upon their own interpretation of what it may mean, I find that, true to that instinct and that impulse, every member of the democratic party here recorded his vote against it, aided by some of their allies and adherents that for want of offices or something else had gone over; and when that amendment was submitted to the people of the States, again true to the same solid and perpetual policy, every democratic State that I know of voted against it, and some States which when it was submitted to them voted in its favor the moment they became democratic undertook to withdraw the ratification that their State had made, of which the State of New York is one notable instance.

Then when we came to the fifteenth amendment, which provided that the right of an American citizen to vote, other things being equal, should not be abridged on account of his race or his color or the fact that he had previously been in a state of servitude, true again to the un-American and anti-liberal policy, every democratic member in this body voted against it still, and I believe every democratic Legislature voted against it also—California, Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Oregon, Tennessee, and two others, Ohio and New Jersey, had rejected it before when they had democratic Legislatures, and another State withdrew its ratification when it became democratic.

Mr. President, what did all that mean? The question then was not upon interpretation whether it invaded State rights, whether the States were to carry it into effect or whether the nation was to carry it into effect; but the question was whether it was right that in those three respects the Government of this country should make progress, and every time, year after year, we have found the party that now opposes this measure resisting not only, as I say, questions of interpretation, but questions of the fundamental propriety of the act itself. They have stood, therefore, with a persistence that would be worthy of a good cause, that slavery should not be abolished. They have said that citizens of the United States should not have the equal protection of the laws. They have said that race and color should still stand in this Republic and be made tests for the exercise of the rights of citizenship. And when you go a little further, sir, you find the same bad policy was still pursued. Every act that was proposed in Congress to maintain the supremacy of the Union, every act that was proposed in Congress to enforce equal rights, to provide for reconstruction, was resisted with the same vigor and with the same persistence. There is not one of the reconstruction acts that had the advantage of a democratic word in its favor or a democratic vote for it. There is not a civil-rights bill securing the simplest and confessedly fundamental rights such as the one proposed in 1866, that received a democratic vote. When we came to 1870 in the second civil-rights bill it was the same thing. And when, after the amendments had been adopted, when measures were proposed to carry them into effect, there still was constant resistance of this party that professes to be in favor of equal rights. Why, Mr. President, even in respect of voting for members of Congress, which under the old Constitution was a subject which Congress had a right to regulate, when it was proposed in order to secure freedom and security to all citizens in elections for members of Congress that there should be in large cities registration laws and securities to the citizens that they should not be cheated out of an election, every democrat in this body voted against it.

Mr. President, this means something. It means, I think, what the people of this country will fully understand and which cannot be concealed by honeyed phrases, that this idea of distinctions still exists in the body of people who claimed that we had no power to resist secession and who, hunting over the Constitution as the Senator from Ohio and his friends have been doing for two or three days, and who now say they cannot find any place in it which says that there shall be no distinction of rights as to juries or as to railways, said through the President of the United States that he could find nowhere anything said about resisting secession, and therefore it could not be resisted. So our friends to-day, animated apparently by the same motive and filled with the same opinions, say "we have hunted through these three new amendments, and we do not find that there is anything in them which enables us to do anything at all; they are dead letters—dry bones."

There is no one thing which has been proposed, or which, I venture to say, can be proposed, to enforce these provisions of the Constitution that the Senators will not, with a solidarity that is absolutely perfect, say "the Constitution gives no warrant for that." There is no law that can be proposed to enforce these provisions in the Congress of the United States, although the Constitution itself says that Congress shall have power to enforce them, that meets with their approval, be it broad or narrow. Let it touch race or religion or sect or whatever, we shall be told when it is proposed, as we have been told when it has been proposed, "We cannot find anything in the Constitution that warrants our doing so, and we are careful not to say that there is any other interpretation or any other measure which Congress can pass to enforce the fundamental rights which have become a part of the Constitution of our country." No, Mr. President, and I say it with pain, the meaning of this, as I believe, is that there is intended to be what a democratic platform not many years ago said it was then designed to be, a period of reaction, and that we are to have, if they can accomplish it, the Union and the Constitution as they were, not as they are; and either by absence of legislation or in some other way there shall be no effectual life in any one of these three amendments. "You say that slavery is abolished, and we accept that now." Very well; what is slavery? Slavery is involuntary servitude, and that is all. Have you not seen, sir, have you not often seen latterly, steps being taken in certain States of this Union to provide for controlling labor, as they call it? Have you not seen it often proposed, and will you not soon see it in law in some of those States, that if a man makes an engagement to labor and breaks that engagement all the damages that his employer is to suffer shall be a lien upon all the future earnings of his life, a mortgage upon that man forevermore, in order that you may pass one more law and say that any man who does not make a labor contract with a planter or somebody else and stay and perform it upon the terms the planter chooses to dictate shall have a mortgage upon the rest of his earnings, or else shall be deemed, as the State laws say, a vagrant, a man having no visible means of support; and a vagrant is a criminal; a criminal is indicted or convicted before a magistrate and sentenced to labor as a vagrant, turned over to the plantation or to the farm, wherever it may be. Then you have got involuntary servitude, and you have not, as they will say, violated the thirteenth amendment or the fourteenth, or anything else, but those who ought to rule, as the kings of England used to say, will rule. And that leads me to believe that when you study the history of the progress of these affairs the contest from 1860 to 1865 is not ended. I do not mean by that that there is any present disposition on the part of anybody to take up arms for secession; but I mean, as Governor Smith—if that was his name—of Georgia, said in an address to the planters and farmers of that State only a year or two ago, that in some way consistently with the letter of the Constitution the old system of planting or a baronial system may be restored, and that those who own the lands, as in some other countries it is unhappily true, control with a rule that is as real and effectual as any slavery the operations and the liberties of the people who live upon their estates.

Now, what does this bill propose to do. This bill that we have under consideration only proposes that if there are any fundamental rights in this Constitution they shall be secured by that power which the Constitution says shall take the measures to secure them, and that the Congress of the United States by legislation appropriate shall secure to every citizen in this land the rights which the Constitution gives him; and yet Senators say this is invading State rights; this is tryannical! Why, Mr. President, State rights justly considered, the real and the true rights of States can only be secured under and by the Constitution of the United States; and therefore, in my opinion, it is an invasion of State rights instead of an attack upon them to say that you will turn every State adrift and all its citizens be subject to the turmoil and the disturbance and the passion and the prejudice which may happen from time to time to exist in any particular State. There is no security for a State that is not found under this bond of union which the Constitution of the United States secures; there is no security to any citizen or a State, either under the State or under any other provision, that is not found fundamentally and in the first place in the fact that the whole family of these States have a common interest in his protection and in the protection of his State; and it was so in the first Constitution as it is in this.

The Constitution of the United States, as was stated in an opinion of the Supreme Court once by an eminent democratic judge, is a bill of rights for the people of all the States, and no State has a right to say you invade her rights when under this Constitution and according to it you have protected a right of her citizens against class prejudice, against caste prejudice, against sectarian prejudice, against the ten thousand things which in special communities may from time to time arise to disturb the peace and good order of the community. That is all this bill undertakes to do. Now let us see what this bill is.

That first section of it simply provides that all persons shall be entitled to certain common rights in public places, in the streets, if they were in—they are not in, but that illustrates it—that no State shall have a right and no person shall have a right to interrupt the common use by citizens of the United States of the streets of a town or city. Where is the authority for that, Senators ask; where is the authority for saying that a State shall not have a right to pass a law which shall declare that all citizens of the German race shall go upon the right-hand side of the streets and all citizens of French descent shall go upon the left, and so on, and that all people of a particular religion shall only occupy a particular quarter of the town, and all the people of another religion another side? Is it possible, with a national Constitution which creates fundamentally a national citizenship, that anybody can say a State has a right to make laws of that kind? I should be amazed to hear it stated. If that can be stated, then I should be glad to know what there is in being a citizen of the United States that is worth a man's time to devote himself to defend for a single instant.

What is it to be a citizen of the United States if being that the citizen cannot be protected in those fundamental privileges and immunities which inhere in the very nature of citizenship? And there is the fault into which my honorable friends on the other side have fallen in arguing this constitutional question. The question is not whether citizens of a particular character, either as to color or religion or race, shall exercise certain functions; but the question is the other way. It is that no citizen shall be deprived of whatever belongs to him in his character as a citizen; and what belongs to a man in his character as a citizen has been long in a great many respects well understood. There was the old Constitution, the fourth article, you remember, which said that citizens of each State should be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States. What did that mean? That has received judicial interpretation.

By common consent of all parties, before this gravest question arising out of the rebellion and the war has been forced upon us, the courts had held with universal acceptance, I believe, that there did belong to citizens certain inherent rights which could not be denied to them, and that you could not, under the Constitution of the United States, either through State or other authority, set up distinctions which interfered with these fundamental privileges. Perfectly consistent with that, as everybody knows, you may say that in order to fulfill a certain function in the State or to hold a certain office all citizens alike must conform to certain qualifications. Your courts may say—a case which seems to have troubled my honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] very much—your courts may say, be they Federal or be they State, that in order to practice law every citizen must possess certain qualifications of sex, of age, of learning, or experience, or whatever; but what has that to do with the question? Unless you can say that it is a fundamental right of a citizen to be a lawyer, you do not get ahead in the argument at all; but yet every one who is acquainted with constitutional history knows that it never has been contended that a fundamental right of a citizen was to be a lawyer or a schoolmaster or a judge or a Senator. The only thing that the Constitution says is that there shall never be a distinction in respect to the rights which belong to a citizen in his inherent character as such. Now, what are those rights? Common rights as the common lawyers used to say, common rights as the courts of the United States have said under the fourth article. Among those may be enumerated—it may be that you cannot make a precise definition, but you can always tell, when you name an instance, whether it falls within it or without it—the right to go peaceably in the public streets, the right to enjoy the same privileges and immunities, without qualification and distinction upon arbitrary reasons, that exist in favor of all others. That is what it is. Then apply it to this bill, and what have you? You say it shall not be competent for any person, either under the authority of a State or without it, to exclude from modes of public travel persons on the ground that they have come from Germany, like my distinguished friend behind me, [Mr. SCHURZ,] or that they have come from Ireland, as some other Senators here may have come, or that their descent is traced from Ham or Shem or Japhet. And yet Senators seem to be greatly alarmed when this simple proposition of common right inherent in everybody is put into a statute-book, which carries out a constitution which declares that every privilege and every immunity of an American citizen shall be sacred and protected by the power of the nation. That is all there is to it; and those, therefore, who go fishing and talking dialectics about attorneys and about slaughter-house cases and police regulations find themselves entirely wide of the mark. The real thing, Mr. President, is that there lies in this Constitution, just as in Magna Charta and as in the bills of rights of all the States, a series of declarations that the rights of citizens shall not be invaded. These bills of rights do not say that A or B or C or any class shall hold an office or be a witness or a juryman or walk the streets. They only say that these common rights, which belong necessarily to all men alike in the reason of things, shall not be invaded on the pretense that a man is of a particular race or a particular religion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry, because I had considerable more to say; but I will not take up the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOGY. Is it in order to reply to the speech made by the Senator from Vermont?

Several SENATORS. No, no.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been asked for on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORWOOD., (when Mr. JOHNSTON's name was called.) I desire to state that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] is detained by sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Washburn, West, Windom and Wright—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Carpenter, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Dorsey, Fenton, Gilbert, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Johnston, Morrill of Maine, and Wadleigh—9.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 792) for the relief of John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Powell.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4746) authorizing the Second National Bank of Watkins, New York, and the State National Bank of North Providence, Rhode Island, to change their names;

A bill (H. R. No. 4829) for the relief of the Willow Springs Distilling Company of Omaha, Nebraska; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4846) to remove the political disabilities of Charles W. Phifer, of Texas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball;

A bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of William J. Patton;

A bill (S. No. 674) to relieve C. D. Anderson of his political disabilities;

A bill (H. R. No. 4838) to declare the true intent and meaning of the twentieth section of an act passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, passed January 14, 1875, entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 4841) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California.

TAX AND TARIFF BILL.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for moment. I ask that House bill 4680 be taken up.

Mr. LEWIS. I object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I move the postponement of all prior orders in order to take it up. This bill is absolutely necessary to the support of the Government, and I desire to have it taken up in order that it may be acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves to take up House bill No. 4680.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire merely to say to the Senate that I trust every Senator will be in his seat this evening in order that this bill may be disposed of, but if there should not be a quorum present at half past seven, the hour to which we have agreed to adjourn, I shall feel compelled to move an adjournment.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I beg leave to present the report of a committee of conference.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, report that said committee have been unable to agree.

LOT M. MORRILL,
A. A. SARGENT,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. A. GARFIELD,
H. H. STARKWEATHER,
STEVENSON ARCHER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It will be seen that the committee have been unable to agree. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments, and ask for another conference.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. STEVENSON the new committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

TAX AND TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to know whether the tax bill has been taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question has not yet been put. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to take up the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR BUCKINGHAM.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, in accordance with precedent on similar occasions I send to the Chair resolutions which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM, late a Senator from Connecticut, business be now suspended, that the friend and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, the Senate again testifies its respect for one whose name has been stricken from its rolls by death.

When the telegraph announced that Mr. BUCKINGHAM was no more, we paused in the work of legislation to do honor to his memory. When a few days later the hour arrived for the great assemblage which had gathered to his funeral at his distant home to go forth bearing his body to its last resting place, we stopped, as it were, for the long procession to pass by and do its solemn office and disperse; and now we pause once more to utter in the hearing of the nation such words of commemoration as seem to us befitting the regard in which we held our associate and our friend. "Eulogies" we are accustomed to call the brief addresses which are spoken on such occasions. I shrink from the application of that word to anything that I can say of him who has so lately gone out from among us forever. He thought so little of himself, he was so unobtrusive of his own personality, so truly simple and modest in everything relating to his fame among men, that it seems as if that kindly face were rising up before me to deprecate words of praise. But in narrating the story of his life the plainest truth is the highest eulogy, and the power of that truth is now one of the gracious influences which are the common property of his countrymen.

WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM was of a Puritan family, the memorials of whose members are still preserved in unbroken line from the first of the name who left England in 1637, and after a temporary abode, first in Boston and then in New Haven, settled in Milford, Connecticut. A volume of these memorials has been printed, and its pages furnish a noble illustration of the power of early influences in molding the character of successive generations. For nearly two centuries and a half, through which the record runs, the ancestors of Governor BUCKINGHAM have been men of fervent piety, of superior intellectual powers, of rare sagacity in affairs, and of prominence in the community of which they were members. His father and mother were both remarkable persons. Of the former it is said:

He was an enterprising and thrifty farmer, who lived comfortably and made his house the home of hospitality. His most striking characteristic was his rare good judgment. He was a Christian gentleman. His habits of business were careful and exact. His reverence was great. He was tender-hearted and full of sympathy for the children of misfortune, as well as rigid in his ideas of personal duty.

A former clergyman of the place where they dwelt, in speaking of the latter a few years ago, says:

When I became pastor of the church, I was struck wherever I went with the love and gratitude which all poured out at the mention of one individual. That individual was the mother of our now good governor—a noble son of a noble mother. Beneath every roof her name was most affectionately mentioned, as her memory is now sacredly cherished. I wondered how she had thus endeared herself to the hearts of that people. But when I saw her at the bedside of the sick and dying ministering like an angel from above to their relief; when I saw her gifts scattered wherever they were needed; when I saw how little she spent upon herself, and how cheerfully she gave to others, I understood the secret.

Of such parentage, on the 28th of May, 1804, in the ancient town of Lebanon, Connecticut, WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM was born. Here, too, the first eighteen years of his life were passed. He was educated in the public schools of his own and of a neighboring village. He learned to labor with his hands upon his father's farm. But there is an education which is neither of the head nor of the hands, in the influences which fill the heart in the morning of life, and which most frequently form the basis of character in after years. What those influences were under his parental roof I have already told. But the external circumstances of his boyhood and youth were almost equally propitious. There is no spot in the world where the conditions which mold a human life are more auspicious than those which existed in his native town from fifty to seventy years ago. Its natural aspects were simple and peaceful. Its one long, spacious street, with wide grassy borders, between which lay the beaten road, here and there overshadowed by ancient trees; the slopes of arable and pasture and meadow land, broken by primitive woods at varying intervals; the scattered farm-houses, with their outbuildings; the rain-and-sun imbrowned meeting-house, school-house, and academy, are all familiar features of the New England village of that day, and in harmony with the life of the people who beheld them—a plain, earnest, thoughtful people, who believed in God and duty; industrious, because they earned their bread by their daily toil; independent, because each man owned the acres which he tilled; intelligent, because the school-house opened wide its doors to all; brave, because fearing God they feared nothing else; pure, because without a shadow on their belief in the Scripture revelation they lived habitually in as vivid a consciousness of the invisible as of the visible world around them. We can hardly realize the intensity of that faith in the present age. It had perhaps too much of a somber tinge, but it pervaded life with the impregnable sense of duty, and robbed death of its terrors by the assurance of a nobler life beyond. The air of the place was moreover full of patriotic associations. It was the home of many prominent characters of the revolutionary period. Chief among these was the family of the Trumbulls. The plain frame house in which they had lived during two generations of distinguished service, and the old "war-office," as it was called, where the elder Trumbull had transacted his public business during his long administration of state affairs, remained landmarks of the past till a period even now recent. School-boys entering the latter looked with awe upon the marks of spurs still to be seen on the side of the counter, where orderlies and express-riders had sat awaiting the governor's orders during the war of independence. In that house Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, La Fayette, Rochambeau, and many other old-time worthies had been guests. French troops had gone into winter quarters here, and five regiments had been reviewed by Washington himself on the spacious street. More than five hundred men from that little town had been in the revolutionary armies at one time, and every house was full of their reminiscences.

It was in the midst of such associations that the boy BUCKINGHAM grew up from infancy to early manhood. The impression which they made may, I think, be traced through all his subsequent life.

At the age of eighteen he taught school for a single year, and then, having selected the calling of a merchant as best adapted to his tastes and circumstances, he began with the rudiments of that occupation by entering into the employment of a mercantile firm in Norwich in the capacity of a clerk. Trade now became his study, and after three years of application he felt himself qualified for business upon his own responsibility. At the age of twenty-three he opened a store in Norwich, and success seems to have attended him from the very first. Indeed he was a model of the man of business. Upright, prompt, faithful to all engagements, attentive, careful, courteous, and possessed of that rare sagacity, which, as we have seen, was a family trait, he won the confidence of all with whom he had relations. At the age of twenty-six he made open profession of the faith which had already become the controlling influence in his life, by uniting in the membership of the church of his ancestors. Between that event and the present hour, forty-five years of a stainless life and of earnest, unceasing Christian endeavor, attest the sincerity of his profession.

After a brief space of time he added manufacturing to his mercantile pursuits, and in 1848 abandoned the latter altogether to devote his entire means and energies to the former in new and more expanded methods. In the mean time he had married and built up a cultivated, refined, and Christian home, where unaffected piety and mutual love shed their benign influences upon all the household and upon the community in which he dwelt. Assiduity and sagacity in business, honorable dealing, unspotted integrity, and fidelity to all engagements, had produced their natural results, and prosperity abundantly rewarded his labors. As the years passed on, the circle of his influence grew wider as the knowledge of his character and qualites was spread abroad. Prior to 1856 he had held no public station except that of mayor of Norwich, but his usefulness, even in a private capacity, could hardly be excelled by that which is ordinarily exerted by men in any position in life. No man ever lived who more truly, unaffectedly, and constantly regarded all his possessions, whether of time, talents, property, or influence, as a stewardship for God and humanity.

I love to contemplate that portion of his life when, a simple private citizen, he was doing the work which he found to do, without thought of the greater future which awaited him. No opportunity to do good, great or small, escaped him. He taught little children in the Sunday-school. As deacon of the church, he was its almoner to the poor and the distributor of the sacred emblems to the membership of its communion and to the stranger within its gates. He helped to found academies, build up public libraries, provide for feeble churches, promote temperance reform, endow colleges, and to send the light of Christian civilization to the remotest corners of the globe. And all this so quietly, so naturally as it were, that, proceeding from him, it seemed nothing extraordinary. Moreover, there were ever flowing from him streams of hidden beneficence, gladdening many hearts and drying the tears in many eyes, whose story never will be told till the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed.

A quarter of a century of such ceaseless activity in business and in doing good could not fail to bring even the private citizen to the public knowledge in his own and the neighboring communities; but the time arrived when he was to be called to more conspicuous labor and duties. Mr. BUCKINGHAM, while hitherto not specially prominent in political life, had nevertheless carried into the discharge of his duties as citizen the same conscientious convictions which pervaded his whole character. The great tide-wave of opposition to the further progress of slavery on the national domain swept over the land, disintegrating old parties and preparing the material for new. He had always been a whig, and with most whigs the Missouri compromise was second in sanctity and inviolability only to the Constitution itself. Its repeal and the purpose which that repeal disclosed shocked every feeling not only of his intellectual but of his moral nature. That he should be a republican under such circumstances was a matter of course. And with him, on the questions that now agitated the public mind, political opinions became a part of his deepest and most solemn convictions. It was no longer the mere expediencies of administration that men thought and talked and wrote about and voted upon, but great and sacred questions of right and wrong and duty, and on such questions there was but one course possible to Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Having settled in his own mind whither right and duty pointed, thither he must go, and with all his might.

In the presidential election of 1856, the first in which the new party entered the field as a national organization, it was felt that his name would be a powerful auxiliary in the canvass, and it was placed on the republican electoral ticket, and contributed greatly to its success. Brought thus prominently before the people of the whole State, his qualities of mind and character became more widely known than ever before, and in the spring of 1858 he was elected governor of Connecticut. For eight years, by successive annual re-elections, he remained in that office. The period comprises the most eventful portion of American history since the war of independence.

It is impossible on an occasion like this even to sketch the outline of Governor BUCKINGHAM'S long administration. In its third year the election of Mr. Lincoln became the signal for the bursting of the storm which had so long been gathering. From the foundation of the Government there had been two circumstances especially hostile to the peace of the Republic. The one a political doctrine, the other an economic system—secession and slavery. Was the body-politic called the United States a nation or a confederacy? From the beginning there had been opposing opinions entertained with equal sincerity by the best minds of the Republic. Great lawyers, jurists, and statesmen were to be found on either side. It should have been a question for lawyers to argue and courts to decide. It might possibly have been so but for the contemporaneous existence of slavery. This system, so feeble at the adoption of the Constitution as to seem destined to perish in a single generation, had become in the course of events the most gigantic material interest and the most formidable political power in the nation. Repugnant certainly to the spirit of the Constitution, to the morality of the age, and to the convictions of a majority of the whole people, its security against assault depended upon the constitutional powers and functions of the States, and an exaggerated assertion of those powers and functions on the part of its supporters was the natural result. So secession and slavery, occupying the same territorial area, had become allies and for more than a generation a perpetual menace. The moral question, moreover, involved in the system of bondage had been decided differently in the minds of the people of the two great territorial divisions distinguished by its presence or absence. Its rectitude was as clear to the one as its intrinsic turpitude was to the other. The election of Mr. Lincoln upon the avowed purpose to put a final period to the further progress of slavery upon the national territory brought the opposing forces to an issue which could no longer be averted. For the preservation of slavery the experiment of secession was inevitable.

To Governor BUCKINGHAM secession was rebellion, and an ordinance of secession was a declaration of war. It did not require the echo of artillery from Fort Sumter to awaken him to the duties of the hour. In the winter of 1860–'61 he began with such means as the disjointed militia laws of Connecticut placed in his hands to prepare for the conflict. Upon the first call of President Lincoln for troops at the fall of Sumter he devoted himself, mind and body and estate, to bring that conflict to a successful issue. Henceforth till the final overthrow of the rebellion his history is a prominent part of the history of the nation. The Legislature of the State was to assemble in a few weeks, but it was impossible to await its meeting. The laws of the State were utterly inadequate to the emergency and responsibility must be assumed. The treasury was empty and money could not be raised for months by the regular methods, but money must be raised. The governor anticipated the enactment of laws, assumed responsibility, and pledged his private credit in the purchase of supplies and munitions of war for the troops which from all parts of the State were filling up the rolls of the volunteers. When the Legislature assembled it passed acts of indemnity and literally placed the whole resources of the State at his disposal. And thus it continued substantially during the entire war. Never was a trust more faithfully executed. As call after call for troops proceeded from Washington the governor was indefatigable in securing the promptest response. As regiment after regiment went forth to the front, he devoted his time, his energies, and often his personal resources to the completeness of their equipment and the promotion of their comfort. His care of them was as tender as that of a father. The historian of the State during this period narrates that—

> Governor BUCKINGHAM made it a matter of duty to visit every regiment and address to its officers words of counsel. "I remember their substance well," says an officer. "After telling us what a noble band of men we had the honor to command, he told us that we could do much both to promote their usefulness and to relieve their privations. 'Remember,' said he, 'that the Government makes ample provision for its defenders. Whatever the Government provides, that your men are entitled to receive. See that they are thus provided. If, through the carelessness of officers on the higher staffs, such provision is not made, do not hesitate to make your complaints until the grievance is remedied. If you cannot get redress otherwise, then write me the facts fully and I will apply to the highest power in the land for you.' Then, after an earnest appeal to us to seek divine guidance and protection, he bade us farewell."

One or two incidents which I know to be authentic will further illustrate this tenderness of the governor for the troops. A citizen of Connecticut, whose duties kept him almost constantly at the front, happened to meet Governor BUCKINGHAM at Washington, and in the course of a conversation the latter said to him, "You will see a good many battles and much suffering; don't let any Connecticut man suffer for want of anything that can be done for him; if it costs money, draw on me for it." The same person, on the last day of the fight at Gettysburgh, when victory had declared on the Federal side, and while yet the fields were strewn with the dead and wounded, seized an opportunity to telegraph the governor the great result, and quick as the wires could bear it came back the response, "Take good care of the Connecticut men."

All through the long and varying conflict the courage of Governor BUCKINGHAM never faltered. With citizens in arms against the Government no compromise, no concession was possible; the very word negotiation implied national death. In his message delivered in the darkest days of the war, just after the bloody repulse of Chancellorville, he said:

> The conflict inaugurated at Sumter must go on until the Government shall conquer or be conquered. Let no one be deceived by the artful device of securing peace by a cessation of hostilities. * * * A peace thus attained would cost a nation's birthright. * * * Civil war is cruelty. Its fruits are desolation, sorrow, and death. Fear, hesitation, and a timid use of the forces of war will eventually increase these terrible sufferings. They will be diminished by courage, vigor, and severity. * * * Whatever of trial, suffering, or privation may be in store for us, or however long may be the controversy, firm in the faith that our nation will be preserved in its integrity, let us in adversity as well as in prosperity, in darkness as well as in light, give the Administration our counsel, our confidence, our support.

Kindly and gentle as we have seen him here in these recent years, it is impossible not to feel that in the veins of him who penned such words flowed the blood of the old Ironsides who fought at Naseby, and at Marston Moor, and that in his breast dwelt the spirit which animated the Hebrew king who, contemplating the inextinguishable hostility of the enemies of his people and of the glorious hopes bound up in their national existence, exclaimed: "Blessed be the Lord my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight."

The exigencies of the war frequently brought Governor BUCKINGHAM to Washington during its whole continuance. Here he speedily won the respect of all by his capacity, firmness, and devotion to the common cause. He was especially endeared to President Lincoln, who reposed in him the same confidence which Washington had bestowed upon his great predecessor, Jonathan Trumbull. As a gentleman, entering the executive office introduced himself as from Connecticut, the President rose from his chair, and, placing his hand impressively upon the visitor's shoulder, exclaimed: "From Connecticut? Do you know what a good governor you have got?"

So long as the war lasted the people of his State would not permit Governor BUCKINGHAM to leave his post. For many years one or at most two re-elections of the same chief magistrate had been the custom of the little Commonwealth; and the governor, weary with incessant labor and apprehensive that the breach of the established precedent might create unpleasant feeling, more than once signified his wish to retire. But the people would not let him, and not until the victory was completely won and the authority of the Republic permanently re-established would they permit him to seek his much needed repose. And even then they were not content. There was one crown which they could yet fitly place upon his head, the highest gift which the people of Connecticut alone could confer upon him. In May, 1866, his last term of office as governor expired. In May, 1868, they elected him a Senator of the United States. And now for almost six years he has gone in and out among us here, regarded by every one of us with loving reverence and unalloyed respect, the humble Christian, the pure statesman, the sincere patriot, the perfect gentleman, in all a model to us all. Ever assiduous in business, doing his work in committee and in the Senate with the laborious industry of his earlier prime and the matured wisdom of his ripening years, he was the faithful representative of his State and the constant guardian of his country's interests. Of him as a Senator in this hour of the freshness of our recollections I need say no more.

When the present session began our friend was not among us. A sickness like a decay, first lingering, then hastening, had fallen upon him. The mind remained clear and unperturbed, while the bodily powers were failing, until near the close, when he sank into unconsciousness and fell asleep. He had lived his three-score and ten years, and his official life among us was just approaching its end. We had hoped for some more years of a serene and honored old age, but these could have added nothing to the beauty of that life or the value of that example.

An incident which occurred on the day of his funeral may perhaps fitly close these reminiscences. All the morning, in the home where he had so long dwelt, his body lay in its still repose, while friends and acquaintances from his own and adjacent communities passed in long procession through the silent room, taking one last look at the face of the departed. It was an impressive scene; great dignitaries were there, Cabinet officers, Senators, Representatives, Governors, and judges of the land; young and old, rich and poor, men and women, the wise, the brilliant, and the beautiful. Among them all was observed a humble negro couple advanced in years. With bowed faces they paused at the coffin, gazed upon the calm features with tears streaming down their dusky cheeks, and passed on, bursting into irrepressible sobs as they moved from the apartment. No one knew the story of those tears, but from what I know of the dead I am sure that there was a story in them, and I call to mind the words of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

The history of such a man is the best delineation of his character. Posterity will affirm of him that his own age was the better for his life, and his example the best legacy that he could leave to succeeding generations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the warm friendship I have for years entertained for Governor BUCKINGHAM and my high estimate of his character forbid that I suffer this occasion to pass away without, as briefly as I may, paying to his memory a parting tribute.

In speaking of him we need not resort to any studied phraseology from the fear that a freedom of expression might unwittingly uncover characteristic faults; and I offend no one who hears me by saying that if his excellence has not been readily recognized, it is because of a moral vision too defective to discern a portraiture of many virtues.

In his death the nation and society have sustained a loss not readily repaired. That combination of integrity and efficiency, of prudence and courage, of kindness and firmness, of patriotism and Christian virtue which formed his character is not often found. As a man of extensive business connections, his opinions on affairs were sought after and respected; and his punctuality in the performance of every obligation was an example. As the war-governor of Connecticut he contributed much to the preservation of the nation, and has shed a luster on the history of his native State. As our companion here, his wisdom and judgment commanded our respect, his virtues won our esteem, and his generous kindness secured our affection. As a member of the Committee on Commerce his extensive practical experience gave weight and authority to his opinions, and as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs he was jealous of the rights of the red man, and seemed never to forget the mutations in the sad fortunes of that decaying people—never to forget that we had "extinguished their council-fires and plowed up the bones of their fathers," and that we were the debtors to the little remnant of a once great race and that the debt would never be adjusted.

Sir, the heroes of the Roman republic made their country their god, their idol. To it they so sacrificed the interests of every other nation and welfare of mankind that their so-called patriotism became a vice. Our lamented friend had higher inspirations. He had been taught by Him who prescribed a virtue to the heart out of which naturally grew not only a pure patriotism, but that philanthropy which takes within its kindly care an immortal race. Patriotism itself becomes subordinate to this more comprehensive beneficence. When the sad tidings of the death of our friend passed over the wires, thousands and thousands of the best people of the country were saddened. Those who while we are engaged in making laws to impose on society external restraints are noiselessly and unobtrusively at work in imposing and impressing on society the more potent and more salutary internal restraints of a pure religion, feel that in his death they have lost an efficient co-worker, a wise counselor, and a bright exemplar. He was a bright example; and as he had no moral obliquities to hide, he had no temptation to resort to pretension or to become a prude in virtue.

The faith he professed received from him no prejudice and no damage. His life was the expression of "an honest, earnest, loving heart, taking counsel of its God and of itself."

His many excellencies, however, gave him no exemption from the solemn summons that must come to all; but they did render that summons a message of peace. And we, while lamenting him, may experience a cheerful gratitude that he was permitted to accomplish so much good, and then to leave us the confident assurance that he has met the reward of the just. His object in life was not his own aggrandizement or the gratification of a mere personal ambition. With him the question was not What shall I get? Where shall I go? but the question was, What shall I be? So far as he lived for himself, it was (to borrow the figure of another) "to frame and construct an instrument called character," from which we, in our daily intercourse, were wont to hear notes of sweet harmony, but the full music of which has now just begun.

As in the clammy cave the continual droppings day by day and year by year form the stalagmite—grotesque or beautiful—so are we all, by each act, each thought, each purpose, forming our characters.

Our fortunes, our associations, our reputations, we leave behind us; but this character, thus continuously and imperceptibly being formed, we take with us, and keep with us throughout the endless cycles of eternity.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the public career of our late friend and associate has been recited by the honorable Senator from Connecticut who was his colleague with an interesting completeness that renders unnecessary an additional word. Yet an expression of sorrow and sympathy from this side of the Senate cannot be unwelcome or inappropriate upon this occasion. I entered this body on the same day as our late friend and brother, having never previously had personal acquaintance with him; and although the committees upon which we were allotted service by the Senate were different, yet relations of a kindly nature soon grew up between us, arising from the contact of general business in this Chamber. I was greatly won by the considerate courtesy which so eminently marked his bearing, and our acquaintance grew closer with the lapse of time, until a sentiment of what I am glad to believe was one of mutual regard established itself between us. Our affiliations in party politics were totally diverse, and upon such questions the sense of duty entertained by each led our voices and our votes usually in opposite directions.

Our habits of life, the schools of thought and action in which we had been reared, had always been of a different character, leading us into the adoption of different theories of social and political government. But the calmness, the serenity, the cheerful, steady, and open advocacy of his conscientious views never suggested condemnation or disrespect of those who opposed him. I well remember on one occasion, when I had combated in debate some opinion he evidently cherished, that, fearing he might have considered himself included in my adverse criticisms, I said to him privately, "I trust you will let me agree with you and yet denounce your opinions." And with a smile of graciousness which every one who knew him must remember, he placed his arm around my shoulder and said: "My dear friend, we both mean what is right, and must not condemn each other because we differ in our ways of attaining it."

In the winter of 1871–'72 Mr. BUCKINGHAM was the chairman of a committee of investigation of which I was a member, which sat in the city of New York for nearly two months. Its sessions were long and laborious, by night and by day, involving much that was calculated to arouse contest between the members. And I would here bear witness to the unfailing industry, the unflagging attention there bestowed upon this public duty by this then aged and venerable man, whose gentle courtesy and good temper never failed upon any occasion. The long life of our friend had been, as we have just been told, one of steady industry and solid, unvarying integrity; and the reward of wealth and the higher reward of public and private regard and respect were his. The people of his native State have attested in many ways and repeatedly their high opinion of his intelligence and worth, and placed him for many successive terms in the chair of their chief magistracy, and sent him into this council Chamber as one of their representatives. Full of years and honors, they now mourn for him.

Let his virtues be written upon marble and remembered and imitated by those of us who survive him. Let such faults and imperfections as are ever attendant upon humanity pass from our minds and find that mercy and forgiveness for which he earnestly and humbly sought and of which we all stand so much in need. Senators, our hearts meet now over this new grave of a departed brother. Shall not this communion of sorrow keep us less far apart in the performance of those daily duties upon which we are in a few hours again to embark?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President:

> The chamber where the good man meets his fate
> Is privileged beyond the common walk
> Of virtuous life; quite in the verge of heaven.

The resolution of the Senator from Connecticut bids us pause in the proceedings of the closing session, that we may render honor to a good man; one who in a long life, crowded with active duties and largely occupied with the responsible control of important public affairs, did not fail in what he owed to himself and to his fellow-men, and who has left on his record nothing that those who love him best and who grieve for him most would wish to efface.

There is nothing certain in life but death.

> Leaves have their time to fall,
> And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
> And stars to set; but all—
> Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

And when death comes early, when it crushes the budding loveliness of childhood or treads upon the bloom of youth, or even when it tramples on the strength of manhood, the natural grief that we feel is aggravated, because the event is as untimely as it is severe; and we murmur that it contradicts the order of nature.

But when the pale messenger lays his hand upon an accomplished life, a life that has rounded out the years which experience and inspiration assign as the desirable limit of human duration; when these years have been occupied with usefulness, rewarded by success, and crowned with honor; when a good man, having discharged the duties and fulfilled the trusts of life, lies down, calmly and peacefully, to his final repose, we may grieve, but we are not permitted to complain. The tears of affection may not indeed be kept back, but the voice of reason is silenced. To complain at the close of such a life is to complain that the ripened fruit drops from the overloaded bough, that the golden harvest bends to the sickle; it is to complain of the law of our existence, and to accuse the Creator that He did not make man immortal on the earth. For such a life eloquence shall lift her voice and poetry shall string her lyre. For such a man, praise, honor, imitation; but not tears! Tears for him who has failed; tears for him who fainted on the wayside; not for him who finished the journey; tears for him who, through his fault or his misfortune, omitted to employ the opportunities that were given to him for the work that was assigned to him, not for him who died when he had accomplished that for which he lived.

We will lament, therefore, in no complaining spirit, for the man whose memory we celebrate to-day. With our grief that he has died shall be mingled our thankfulness that he has lived. The State that he served so faithfully and so well, in the time of her greatest emergency, proudly lifts his name and inscribes it on the roll of her honored and remembered sons. And the history of that State cannot be fairly written, without honorable mention of his character and his services. The Senate which he informed with wise councils, which he adorned with dignity of manner and with purity of life, bears equal testimony to his abilities and to his virtues, and equal honor to his memory.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I rise to add a word to what has been so well and so eloquently said by the Senator from Connecticut and those who followed to the memory of his late colleague and our departed brother.

My acquaintance with Governor BUCKINGHAM commenced upon my entrance into the Senate in 1871. A joint service with him upon the Committee on Indian Affairs brought us closely together, and I soon learned to honor and respect him. I shall not speak of his public service in the Senate; it was known to us all; it was appreciated by all.

Governor BUCKINGHAM was a man of decided character. Without brilliancy, he possessed a strong, clear judgment, was a man of decided opinions and strong convictions, from which he never swerved.

He was eminently industrious and attentive to his official duties, but always gentle and courteous in the discharge of them. But his example, Mr. President, to the Senate and to the world possessed a higher value. Earthly distinction is of "the earth, earthy;" it attracts and dazzles for a brief period and then passes away and perisheth; but a conscience void of offense before God and man is an inheritance for eternity. And such, I believe, was the possession of the late WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM. His religious convictions were of the highest and deepest type. No irreverence, no frivolity, no loud professions of his faith ever escaped his lips. He believed that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father was to visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions and to keep himself unspotted from the world. This he illustrated in his daily life, this he rejoiced in in his calm and quiet life. He lived in hope; he died in triumph.

Mr. President, as I stood but a few days ago in the still, quiet cemetery of that beautiful city where he lived and which holds now all that is mortal of the dead Senator, I beheld such a demonstration of all classes, such grief as filled me with a just appreciation of how WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM had lived and how WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM had died. His memory will be cherished so long as the recollection of his virtue, his faith, and his fidelity remain; and these should never perish. Senators, we shall see him no more; but he has given to each and all of us that bright example to be always ready at the summons which we know awaits us all.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, only heart words, words of truth are of value or to be weighed by speaker or hearer on such an occasion as that now before us. And to me not the least gratifying reflection is that the highest tribute which can be paid our late colleague is that the heart's richest and warmest promptings and utterances may be and are those of entire and simple truthfulness. Still it remains that in this presence, remembering as we do his manly and Christian bearing as a citizen and Senator, we feel how poor are mere words to do even partial justice to his great excellence and many virtues.

I met Governor BUCKINGHAM for the first time when taking my seat in this Chamber nearly four years since. I was then, as always afterward, impressed, as I know all were, with his amiable disposition, sterling worth, his devotion to right and duty, his unobtrusive manner, his ever earnest advocacy of the cause of the weak and oppressed, his Christian faith, and, what was far more, his Christian life.

I but repeat what has been said by others when I say that his work ere was not so much in mere appearance or sho w as in its quiet and ractical value to the Senate and the country. Participating in our ebates but seldom, he nevertheless, in those matters requiring patient ndustry, tireless investigation, watchfulness, the care of the conscientious business man, yea, of pure purpose and clear brain and judgment, was ever at home, had but few equals, was the peer of any. And hence as my acquaintance ripened into warm friendship, and I came to know more and more of his purity of purpose and the thoroughness of his investigations, if in doubt as to my course, I simply asked what has he said or advised, what was his vote, and followed his lead. I knew his path could not and would not probably lead me from the right, could not be other than that of safety. His was always a "straight road," and a traveler in this never gets lost.

The public life of such a man always tells for the welfare of the Republic. The public measure or true greatness is not infrequently greatly at fault. For the nation's upbuilding, for the nation's quiet, for the nation's strength, for the nation's perpetuity, we need industrious, faithful, practical, and not merely brilliant official life, high and practical moral worth and conduct; rather than mere cultivated brain or intellect, indifferent to or unmindful of the only safe or reliable element and basis of true greatness. Goodness is greatness. The good are great. Only the truly good can be truly great. High, true, moral worth and greatness in the individual and the nation are hence of greater value in securing obedience to law, the repression of any and all spirit of violence, guaranteeing justice to every citizen and all rights to all, than written constitutions, all statutes, the whole police power of the Government. To one thus imbued the nation should and always will look as a reliable legislator, a leader to be safely followed, a citizen to be revered and respected; and his life-work is felt not alone while he, though ever so modestly, in person points the way, but in the nation's coming or after years as well.

Such in a pre-eminent degree was the life of our friend. He was a conscientious and just man, just to his political opponents and to his friends. His moral character lifted him above the criminations of party strife, the breath of suspicion itself. There was with him always a wise and a considerate propriety of conduct, a love of truth, the deepest sense of moral and religious obligation, an unaffected modesty, the absence of all selfish feelings, a benevolent and kindly charity, which was both a principle and rule of his life and an innate sentiment of his very heart. "In him there was no glare, nothing to dazzle, but an abundance of that pure, mellow light of declining evening upon which we all love to look." When the sun went down upon such a life, the nation justly and truly mourned. His was a worthy and noble ambition. He filled well and honorably the highest and most sacred trusts. Respected and loved by his State, revered by all, elected to and taking high position in the highest deliberative body of the world, having attained what all men esteem, almost if not quite, the topmost round of fame's ever up-reaching ladder, he, in the language of another, "stepped thence to the skies." Who of us next shall join him?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I put on no sable, none of the trappings of woe, to stand by the bier of BUCKINGHAM. I recall no single trait in his character, no incident in his career, to bow me with a sense of humiliation. On the contrary, the memory of all the years I knew him fills me with exultation. To be sure, as I look to the chair he occupied, I miss the breathing benediction which always seemed to emanate from it while he sat there. As I look into the saddened faces of the Senate, I see clearly "he is not here." But not one angel only, a multitude rather which no man hath numbered, all in shining garments, assure me "he is risen."

And then, sir, I remember with grateful pride that he was an American Senator.

I need not remind you how in these latter years calumny has emptied all its vials upon the heads of public men and upon the endeavors of public life. It has really seemed at times as if the fountains of falsehood's great deeps were broken up, and that society, which can no more be overwhelmed by floods, was to be drowned by detraction. A friend told me that when traveling along a railway in New England two years ago, she heard a fellow-traveler declare with emphasis his settled belief, that there was not an honest man in either House of Congress. But BUCKINGHAM was then here. And who of all who knew him will doubt, that when he left us, as white a soul as ever passed the pearly gates, went from the Senate to his waiting seat among the seraphim!

It is but a modest space which his utterances occupy in the records of our deliberations. But meager as it is, we could illy afford to spare them from that record. What he said he considered well; and he had that rare wisdom which is born of steady judgment, ripe experience, unerring conscience, and patriotic purpose.

Could he have taken a transcript of those utterances with him he would have needed no other evidence upon which to challenge that prize he most coveted—the final award of his Creator of "Well done, good and faithful."

Nay, sir, could those readiest of all writers, who photograph the daily debates of the Senate, have accompanied him constantly and so have furnished a transcript of his daily conversation, he might, I fondly believe, have taken the whole with him as the picture of a life directed to the loftiest aims, guided by a gentle courtesy which lured a world to follow, and inspired by a generous toleration which wholly disarmed the envy, and half consoled the chagrin, of all who failed to keep pace with him.

I do not mean to detain the Senate by the attempt to sketch his characteristics; that would be needless if it were not vain. What rhetoric can do to embalm those characteristics has been fitly done. Posterity may drink new inspiration from the record of the testimony which the Senate this day bears to the worth of a colleague. We are privileged to remember what posterity can only read. Ours is the higher privilege. Speech is not quite adequate to portray a character so simple and so grand as that we commemorate. He was his own best expositor. One who has stood before the broad, open, clear, pure, white corolla of the Victoria regia is not apt to be enthused by any description of it, however faithful. We have seen BUCKINGHAM, and lived and worked with him.

One incident in his life I will venture to recall, which not inaptly illustrates his enduring excellence. By command of the Senate I was with others assigned but three years ago to aid the deceased on the investigation of alleged abuses in the customs service in New York. It was an irksome task, yet we prosecuted it for weeks. Daily we were splashed with the foul humors engendered in the glandered politics of a great city. Malice unwound a hideous web before us, shot with a thread of fact to a shuttleful of falsehood.

During the whole trial I did not once hear from him a censorious remark or even a petulant exclamation. It was evident he was human and that he felt. Occasionally, when the manifestations were especially spiteful, his countenance would wear that mingled expression of pain and resignation which art has so long and so vainly toiled to reproduce in some ecce homo, that look, half willing and half shrinking, which one fancies the shuddering Saviour wore as there broke from his lips the supplication, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." But the poultice of a night relieved the suffering, and each succeeding day restored him to his work, showing no more trace of scars from the inflictions of the yesterdays than the sun bore which lighted him to his work.

Mr. President, I have long felt to regret that I never heard Jenny Lind sing, that I never saw Rachel act. They must have been marvelous specimens of art. Governor BUCKINGHAM was a grand piece of nature. I shall always regret that I could not have known him in domestic life. I am persuaded that was his masterpiece. I never saw him in the presence of a child. But I partly know what he was as a father. Once he spoke to me of a daughter, and no June morning ever suffused the eastern sky with a more genial radiance than that which broke over the face of the father as he told me how good that daughter was.

Sir, I should wrong the memory of Governor BUCKINGHAM and grieve his truthful spirit, only that his spirit is beyond the reach of grief, if I should neglect to bear testimony to one thing. There is in this unbelieving generation a loud, if not a large element, desperate if not devilish, hoping nothing here and fearing nothing hereafter, which screams with derision of the Christian statesman! Standing by the grave of Governor BUCKINGHAM I must not forget to tell the world that he was what I have never dared pretend to be—a Christian statesman.

Mr. President, do not imagine because I am so filled with boasting of the illustrious dead that I for a moment forget he is dead. These fond memories, bright as they are, cannot delude me into forgetfulness that memories are all we have left of him. Sir, I am not at all insensible to the greatness of our loss.

I have met with a personal loss. He made me feel he was my friend, and I believe still he was my friend. But there was no reason why he should be, except in that broad and liberal sense in which he was the friend of everybody. Still, if I knew the idea of his personal regard was a delusion, it is so sweet a delusion I should cling to it and should still feel that I had lost the society of a cherished friend.

The Senate has lost an associate upon whose counsels it was apt to lean and in whose companionship it did always delight.

The country has lost the services of a statesman upon whose wisdom, whose experience, whose unflinching courage, unfaltering integrity, and unswerving patriotism she had learned to rely.

The State of Connecticut has lost a citizen whom she has delighted to honor. All these losses are very heavy. But have we a right to repine at such losses? He was spared to us so long; he had just filled up his three-score and ten years. Surely we ought to consent to a return of even the richest of God's loans at some time.

And then he was so exactly ripe. The suns of seventy summers had set their seal upon him. All had mellowed, not one had parched him. He stood upon the summit of the long ascent, not travel-worn, not spent with toil, but new-breathed and fresh in spirit, with all the brightest hopes that blossomed on his youth not faded but fruited in that grand but simple faith which sustained and guided his maturer years. He seemed to us rather "as if an angel dropped down from the clouds" than a man climbed up from the valley.

Sir, our losses may be calculated, though not readily. Indeed they may be repaired, though not easily.

There is, however, in that busy Connecticut a family circle broken up by a loss which cannot be calculated or repaired by mere human appliances. I could not forget on this occasion that there are such sufferers, yet I know it does not belong to such as I to speak to them. A friend told me but a few weeks since that it happened to him one day last summer to discover, while at dinner, that himself and his daughter were to start for a distant city over the same highway by different trains, leaving only an hour apart. The family smiled at the coincidence.

We cannot now lift up those who bend over the grave of BUCKINGHAM; but we can comfort ourselves with the assurance that the same great faith, which always sustained him, will in time enable those who mourn him, to lift the curtain which separates two worlds, and then they will see that the departed is but one with whom it is a dear delight to travel, who has taken an earlier train for a common destination.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I can do no more than express my high appreciation of the character of the deceased as it was manifested during the years he sat among us. My acquaintance with him began when he entered the Senate, and the friendly relations that soon followed were never marred by any difference of opinion, however great. I always found him polite, amiable, and ready to oblige—a noble specimen of a true gentleman. I always found him an industrious and careful legislator, distinguished by an excellent judgment, and naturally inclined, I believe, to moderation. Earnest in the discharge of his duties, he was never obtrusive, never presumptuous, and never said a word calculated to inflict a wound. And hence, when he last walked from this Chamber he left no one within its walls who did not feel for him respect, kindness, and esteem. A Senator of whom after years of service this can truly be said needs little more of eulogy. There is so much to create passion, prejudice, or ill-will in the contests imposed upon us by a discharge of our duties, that he who finishes his senatorial career with the universal good-will and respect of his brethren is most surely a character that merits commemoration and honor.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, twice has death entered this Chamber during the Forty-third Congress and taken from our midst associates with whom we held daily counsel. Twice with unerring aim has he struck down those we honored for their wisdom, admired for their virtues, and who commanded our respect by the fidelity with which they performed their public duties here.

When the first one fell it was as when a monarch tree falls, without warning, in the silent forest. Far and wide the vibrations reach. In his case they crossed the ocean and their echoes only ceased when the limit was reached where the language in which he clothed his thoughts is spoken. In him were centered genius, learning, culture, experience, profound conviction, and purity of soul. All the world reached by his fame said a great man had fallen.

Scarcely had we accustomed ourselves to the absence from his well-known seat in this Chamber of Charles Sumner, when the insatiate archer aimed his fatal shaft at another shining mark, and to-day we mourn the death of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM. Putting aside our daily tasks, we have set apart this hour to pay such respect as feeble words will permit to the memory of this honored public servant and eminently good man whose face we shall see no more. We turn instinctively to that vacant chair he occupied; we recall the white crown, emblem of purity, which he who filled it wore; the benevolent face, the kind manner, the uniform courtesy which were always his. We cannot realize that this familiar presence is forever gone from our midst. With me it is a melancholy pleasure to have the opportunity to speak a few sad words of the deceased which shall testify of the respect in which I held him while living, and the honor in which I hold his memory.

I wish it were in my power, sir, to paint in true colors his portrait and hold up to others who knew him less those rare traits of character and courtesies of manner which made him at once an object of deepest respect and love.

I met him first in this Chamber nearly six years ago, and while many of his associates may lay claim to a greater intimacy than I enjoyed, no one I feel sure more sincerely mourns his loss. With perfect truth I can say that in all the acquaintances I have formed with public men since coming to this Capitol, no one has impressed me more strongly as being thoroughly conscientious and honest in his public and private life than Mr. BUCKINGHAM.

He was a statesman in the best sense of that term. What makes a statesman? Not knowledge alone, however wide, deep, varied, and all-comprehensive; not mere quickness of apprehension to detect the latent fallacy in argument or proposition; not large experience with men and subjects in the legislative forum, nor familiarity with parliamentary rules; it does not consist alone in great powers of debate. All these may coexist and yet something be wanting to complete our beau ideal of the statesman. What is the lack? What is still wanting? I reply, perfect integrity, broad philanthropy, and an ardent patriotism, which, discarding selfish aims and local benefits, seek to elevate the whole people; to make them wiser and better and to promote their material welfare.

Such statesmanship in our exterior relations avoids wars and removes all causes of war. It cultivates friendly relations and seeks no unjust advantages; and in our domestic concerns frames equal and just laws, favoring no classes but providing for the well-being and happiness of all.

Statesmanship of this stamp ignores State lines in our national legislation and regards the whole brotherhood of States with equal favor and dispenses equal justice and benefits to all.

I do not mean that it forgets or should forget the past so far as precaution is necessary to prevent the recurrence of disturbances affecting the well-being of the whole; nor that it should omit the most stringent remedies to curb the lawless and repress violence. But statesmanship harbors no malice nor resentments, but seeks to forget the animosities engendered by war and to build up the waste places.

To this highest type of statesmanship he belonged whose memory we honor to-day. He was not a great orator, upon whose utterances men hung with bated breath; he did not mingle frequently in debate; he did not aspire to the honor of leadership, nor was his education as comprehensive as that of many. He made no pretense to superior mental culture. But he possessed that practical knowledge of the affairs of the country; its varied industries and wants; its internal and foreign commerce; its growing manufactures; its vast agricultural and mineral resources, and especially that knowledge of our relations with the various Indian tribes, to which subject he gave so much of his attention as the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, as to eminently qualify him to be a judicious adviser in this body and to frame appropriate laws upon these subjects.

Without making any pretense to the graces of oratory, he possessed the faculty of setting forth his views in a way all could understand. With this was coupled that sincerity of manner that made all men respect if they could not adopt his views.

And while dwelling upon his course in this Chamber let me allude to another matter. Debates sometimes engender heat and hasty speech. But who can forget his unvarying courtesy? Who ever saw him forget for a single moment the propriety of debate? Who ever heard fall from his lips a word calculated to offend or wound? Who ever saw his brow cloud with anger or his face flush with sudden passion? Who ever suspected him of equivocation or double-dealing? No, sir; he was the soul of truth—the embodiment of honor. In him centered the virtues which make up the Christian gentleman.

I do not undertake to enter upon the history of his life before he came here. That work has been done by his colleague. It is enough to know that he was a self-made man, springing from humble life with imperfect early advantages. He was first a farmer, then a merchant, then a manufacturer, before his fellow-citizens called him to a higher sphere of action. They wisely judged that he who with such intelligence and probity managed his private affairs might safely be trusted with the administration of the affairs of the Commonwealth. For eight years we know, by successive elections, he filled the office of chief magistrate of the State of Connecticut. This long term of service covered a period of great trial and responsibility, when the civil war that was raging imposed upon the executives of the States duties of greatest magnitude. He belonged to that noble fraternity of war governors upon whom Mr. Lincoln leaned for support in the darkest hours of the war. How Governor BUCKINGHAM performed these duties, how he pledged his own ample estate to put the military forces of Connecticut into the field, we all know.

When the war was over and peace returned, the gratitude, the confidence, the love of his people sent him here to represent them in the highest legislative forum of the country. With what fidelity he performed this his last and highest trust you, my fellow-Senators, are the witnesses.

Advanced years invited him to repose. He possessed fortune and friends. He could well have claimed that he had done his full share of public duty and earned a good title to be retired, but the habits of a life of active usefulness would not allow him to do this. From the early morning of life, all through its meridian and afternoon, he had been a faithful worker; and he could not lay aside the habits which had grown to be part of his nature when the evening approached, and so, it may be said of him, he died in the harness.

Contact with the world, its jostlings and collisions, had no effect to mar the simplicity of his character or cool the warmth of his heart. That retained a freshness almost boyish. Though he had climbed far up the Alpine heights, so that the glistening peak was near at hand, and winter snows all around him, he looked down upon the valleys below glowing with tropical gorgeousness and sympathized with the joyousness of earth's youth, the laughter of children, the music of birds, the joy and hope and universal gladness, without envy or a sigh that he could not descend but must hold on his way until the bleak summit was reached.

The cold winds which made havoc with his gray hairs and chilled the surface could not reach the warm heart which beat beneath.

Rare old and yet young man! long shall we miss that face radiant with goodness; that courtesy which never varied, that manner void of all pretension, that wisdom and probity which promptly met and solved the problems, many and full of difficulty, which rose here. In his life he was a model to be studied by those who doubt the power of truth, of frankness, and straightforwardness to win the highest prizes which men seek. He has gone to his rest, full of honors and ripe in years, without an enemy and without a blot. From far and near the people of his native State gathered at his funeral to pay the last tribute of respect. Ere long there will rise in yonder Congressional Cemetery, so beautiful in its surroundings, a monument to commemorate that another member of Congress has passed away during his term of service. On it I would have it inscribed, under the name of our departed friend, "He feared God, he loved his fellow-man, he tried to do his duty."

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, to the student of our political system, the American Senate is one of the most interesting and significant institutions of our Government. Its members change, vanish, and disappear, but like the king, it never dies. Amid the mutations and vicissitudes of our national affairs, so far as anything human can be immutable, it continues stable and permanent. It has no periods nor epochs. Administration follows administration and Congress succeeds Congress like fast ensuing waves, but the Senate flows onward in an unbroken current through our history like the Gulf Stream, that majestic ocean-river, amid the fluctuations of the sea.

It is the same body to-day that assembled at the adoption of the Constitution. It has no interregnum nor end of days. Its functions never cease. Born with the birth of the nation, it has grown with its growth and will end only with its death. Administrations close, and their history can be written. Congresses adjourn, and the verdict of their labors can be recorded and their influence upon the country measured and estimated, but the history of the Senate is the history of the Republic.

When the "inevitable hour" arrives, which is common to nations as to individuals, and the destiny of America has been accomplished; when the representatives of the people shall finally adjourn and depart from these Halls forever, and the great dome in whose shadow we assemble shall be surrendered to decay, those who for the last time depart from this Chamber will be the lineal successors of those who first took the oath as Senators of the United States.

Removed by these conditions of its existence from the vehement agitation, flame, and passion of popular elections, though not sufficiently remote to be insensible to public opinion, the Senate represents what is most stable and deliberate in the national judgment. Its orbit resists the perturbations and disturbances to which the other members of the system are subject, and marks the definite path of the progress of the nation.

From the nature of its functions, the character of its deliberations is largely determined. The rancor of partisanship is dulled. The wildest excesses of the champions of popular rights are curbed. Courtesy and decorum are the rule of debate, and the purpose of the orator is less to rouse the passions than to convince the judgment.

The dead Senator whose virtues we here recall possessed in an eminent degree the qualities that should pertain to that high office.

As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which he was chairman, it was my good fortune to be brought for a brief space into friendly and intimate relations with Governor BUCKINGHAM, and the memory of his virtues will always remain among the most valued reminiscences of my life.

Entering the public service at a period past the maturity of his years, without special training or previous legislative experience, he did not aspire to eminence in debate, nor strive for the triumphs of oratory, but was distinguished for practical judgment in affairs of state, and for a purity of purpose that was never surpassed among the servants of the Republic.

While the powers of his intellect were upon a high plane, yet were I called upon to define the impression that remains strongest with me, I should say it was that of incomparable rectitude and integrity. To do right seemed less a dictate of conscience than an inevitable law of his being. Without disparagement to others, and with no faith in the vulgar imputations upon the morality of public men, there was a conspicuous luster in the soul of Governor BUCKINGHAM that impressed all who were brought within the scope of his influence.

Micat inter omnes
Velut inter ignes Luna minores.

The rewards of gratified ambition and the applause of mankind possess allurements that few who can obtain them are able to resist; but there is an hour which comes to all when they lose their power, and are as valueless as the vanished breath from which they sprang. At the dark portals of the grave, the vestibule of the world to come, it is better to have been good than to have been great. Mr. President, as we reflect upon the strange problem of human life, we are impressed with its incompleteness. Everything is fragmentary. Nothing is perfected. Man dies, leaving the labor of his life unfinished, and his works do follow him. It is an admonition and a warning, but not without prophecy; not without hope that some future career of renewed activity may perfect the destiny interrupted here. To this law of our existence the career of Governor BUCKINGHAM was an apparent exception. The orb of his life was nearly rounded; he had reached the allotted period of existence without abatement of his powers; fortune favored his labors, and the wealth which his industry had accumulated was distributed by benevolence; those to whom he was most endeared had preceded him to the land of shadows; his State recognized his claim to the highest civic honors, and the nation, by the obsequies which we here solemnize, transmits his memory as a priceless heritage, a stimulus, and an example to the latest generation of American citizens.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if I was called upon to state the distinguishing characteristics of Governor BUCKINGHAM, I should agree with the Senator from Kansas that they were his high conscientiousness at all times and under all circumstances and his charity. It seemed to me that Governor BUCKINGHAM always tried to do right, and that that consideration was ever uppermost in his mind. He had charity for all; he attributed good motives to all, and to those who differed from him the most widely in politics he attributed patriotism and integrity. I never heard him say an evil word of any human being. He was a man of strong sense. He discussed questions on this floor not generally from a legal stand-point, for he was not a lawyer, but oftener from a moral point of view, from a common sense and a business point of view. He was industrious, and his purpose was always to do his duty in small things as well as in great.

What more, Mr. President, can I say in addition to what has already been better said by others, unless it be one or two things somewhat of a personal character?

I first met Governor BUCKINGHAM when he took his seat in this body on the 4th of March, 1869. I felt from the first that we were friends, and we were. He always expressed a deep interest in my health; his inquiries were always tender and almost from day to day. Though I had never met Governor BUCKINGHAM until that time, yet we had been in correspondence years before under circumstances of a most solemn character. It was, I think, in the summer of 1862, a few weeks, perhaps a month, before the issue of the proclamation of emancipation by Mr. Lincoln, that I received a lengthy letter from Governor BUCKINGHAM, in which he discussed the general situation of the country. It was at a gloomy period, when victory was not resting upon our arms. Toward the close of the letter he suggested the question whether the Government was doing its duty in regard to the institution of slavery, and whether we could hope for ultimate victory while that institution was protected and preserved; but he expressed himself as uncertain as to whether the time had arrived when any step could be taken toward its destruction. He said that he had had an interview or a letter—I forget which—but recently from Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, which had led him to write me on the subject. In replying I agreed with him upon the main suggestion of his letter, expressing the same doubt, however, as to whether the time was ripe, whether public opinion was in that condition to authorize the President of the United States to take the decisive step which he afterward took.

During my intercourse with Governor BUCKINGHAM as a member of this body he often talked to me about his experience as governor during the war. We often compared notes upon that subject. He evidently regarded his services as governor of Connecticut during the war as the great event of his life, and on several occasions expressed his doubts as to whether it was wise or expedient for him to accept a seat in this body, and whether he ought not to have retired from public life when the war was over.

Just before the close of the last session, and before his departure, he came across to my seat where I am now sitting, and said, "Well, we are about to separate. I hope we will meet next winter in better health." He said, "I am an old man, and feel that my race is nearly run." He said, "There are only three of us left who served as governor of our respective States throughout the entire war," referring to himself, to Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, and to myself. He said that Yates and Andrew were gone, and that we, notwithstanding our utmost hopes, must soon follow; and taking me by the hand expressed the hope that we should meet the coming winter in better health. We parted to meet no more.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I rise not for the purpose of addressing the Senate but for the purpose of offering an additional resolution. Connecticut, by the voice of my distinguished friend and associate, [Mr. FERRY,] has pronounced a fitting eulogium upon her honored dead. Many Senators have spoken here in fitting terms of his character and of his many virtues. But a word, sir, and I shall be done.

Governor BUCKINGHAM came late into public life, and shortly after entering upon it there arose grave and great questions upon which men antagonized. Though many years younger than he, I had been somewhat in public life. My political convictions differed from the convictions of our deceased friend. I am glad to say here that however much they differed, though we were not intimate, yet our personal relations were always friendly. And, sir, I will say here, and I ask for no higher eulogium upon myself either from political foe or personal friend, that whatever WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM did in the line of his duty, he did it in all honor and in all honesty. If there were differences of opinion between him and some of his fellow-citizens, those differences to-day are cast into the great lumber-room of the past and are forgotten. He was a gentleman, a kindly gentleman. Blessed with large wealth, he showered it upon the needy. True to his friends, true to his convictions, true to those great principles which should govern us all, he went down to the grave an honest man. Noble heart, farewell! Pure, gentle spirit, fare thee well! The earth which bears thee dead bears not alive a truer gentleman.

Mr. President, I beg leave to offer this resolution:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the late Senator BUCKINGHAM the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and (at six o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. With the consent of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has charge of the bill under consideration to-night, I move that it be passed over informally and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-route bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I object.

Mr. HAMLIN. O, no! let us pass it. There is not a word of legislation in it.

Mr. LEWIS. There is not one word of legislation in a bill which I want to have passed. I have asked the Senate repeatedly, over and over again, to take it up. I am going out within a day or two, and I will not trouble this body much longer. I shall object to anything until you do justice to this man.

Mr. RAMSEY. This is the post-route bill. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection to it. His constituents and the constituents of every other Senator are interested in it.

Mr. LEWIS. I withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose this is the usual post-route bill?

Mr. RAMSEY. The usual post-route bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Without any legislation?

Mr. RAMSEY. Without any legislation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If no one objects I will not object to its present consideration, with the right to call for the regular order at any time.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4734) to establish certain post-routes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill, unless the reading is dispensed with.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me say to the Senate that there is not one word in this bill but the simple establishment of routes, and I ask if there is any necessity for reading it? I move to dispense with the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BOGY. I object.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the chairman with regard to this bill if the committee have agreed to the amendments that I offered?

Mr. RAMSEY. Certainly; all your amendments are agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to suspend the reading of the bill. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BOGY. I object. I want the bill read if we are going to be forced to come here every night.

Mr. RAMSEY. I appeal to the Senator to withdraw his objection. He has a great many amendments in the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well, let the bill be read. I think it is very good reading, and the Senator from Missouri wants instruction.

Mr. BOGY. I do. I am very much like the Senator from Maine, I need it. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and was interrupted by Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I withdraw the call for the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator withdraws his call for the reading, and the question is on the amendments proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. They will not be read unless some Senator calls for their reading.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

UNSETTLED ACCOUNTS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, now I appeal to the Senator from Vermont to allow me to get a vote upon my bill. There will be no objection. All objection has been withdrawn to the bill, so far as I can learn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If no debate arises on it I shall not object.

Mr. LEWIS. I shall not debate it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4727) explanatory of the act passed June 20, 1874.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not object to the present consideration of the bill, but I shall insist upon having a communication from the District commissioners read, and then Senators can do as they please about it.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it has not been read through.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment that this shall not apply except for services rendered after the passage of an act of which my friend from Iowa will give me the date.

Mr. ALLISON. June 20, 1874.

Mr. LEWIS. That is in the bill. It is exactly what the bill says.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it is in the bill. Let us have the bill read again.

Mr. LEWIS. Read the bill and you will find it is there.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us have the bill read through.

The bill was again read.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I ask that the letter of the District commissioners be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., February 19, 1875.

SIR: Our attention has been called to House bill 4727, explanatory of the act passed June 20, 1874, that has passed the House of Representatives and is now before the Senate, intended for the relief of L. P. Wright, Dennis O'Neal & Co., and Brennan & Hutton, which we trust will not become a law.

In explanation of our disapproval of so much of the bill as relates to Wright, we inclose a copy of a communication from the engineer of the District to the commissioners, dated January 25, 1875, which shows that Wright had the privilege of canceling the contract, which he declined to exercise. Having elected to continue the contract, it seems to us too late for him now to ask additional compensation. Other reasons will be found in the communication why relief should not be granted him.

As to the contract of Dennis O'Neal & Co., we know of no reason why this should be put on any different footing from the other contractors whose contracts were pending on the 20th of June, 1874. We beg to say that the full amount of the contract was $29,900 per annum, for which, for the seven months from July 1, 1874, to February 1, 1875, they have received full payment in 3.65 bonds. In addition to this, O'Neal & Co. have been allowed $850 per month for removing ashes, as extra work under this contract, for which they have been paid in full in 3.65 bonds to February 1, instant, leaving due them only to the 15th instant, two weeks, when they have been ordered to discontinue the removal of ashes.

In regard to Messrs. Brennan & Hutton's contract, it has been fully paid in 3.65 bonds, with 15 per cent. additional on account of the following clause in the contract, to wit: "And shall be paid in cash, or the equivalent of cash in bonds or certificates of the board of public works, as said board may elect or determine."

The Senate will understand that all settlements and payments on each of the foregoing contracts were made by the board of audit, consisting of the First and Second Comptrollers of the United States Treasury, the commissioners having no jurisdiction over them.

The commissioners will add, if allowance is made to either of the foregoing-named parties, it will be necessary for Congress to make appropriations therefor not chargeable to any of the current revenues of the District, taxes or otherwise, but to be accounted for in any future adjustment between the Government and the District of Columbia.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District Columbia.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

ENGINEER'S OFFICE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 25, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: In reference to contract No. 992 of L. P. Wright, for sweeping the streets and avenues in Washington and Georgetown, I have the honor to submit the following statement of facts: Mr. Wright was awarded this contract on December 4, 1873, as will be seen from a copy of the letter of award herewith transmitted, the contract, however, to date from January 5, 1874.

Mr. Wright's original bid, herewith inclosed, was in response to an advertisement by the board of public works calling for proposals for this class of work, and was twenty-eight dollars per mile of street sprinkled, swept, and cleaned, "in cash or its equivalent." The terms of the contract referring to the mode of payment are the same as in other contracts made by the board, no issue of 3.65 bonds being anticipated in any case. Upon my taking charge of this office, Mr. Wright, in common with other contractors, was furnished with a circular (a copy inclosed) in regard to the payment of all future work in 3.65 bonds, upon the certificate of the board of audit. He afterward called upon me and urged that the work under his contract should be paid for in cash, as being necessary under the current expenses of the District. I told him that there was no authority of law for the payment of the work under his contract in cash, but proposed to him to ask for the cancellation of the contract and the advertising anew for proposals for the work, adding that as he had all the material and machinery on hand he would probably be able to bid lower than any one else. This proposition he declined to act upon, preferring to retain the contract as it stood.

This contract differs in no particular from all others which have been referred for settlement to the board of audit, except in the nature of the work; that I do not consider a sufficient reason for excepting it from the act of June 20, 1874, in regard to the mode of payment. As in every other case, the contract is a special agreement for a limited time.

The contract for cleaning alleys, similar to this, has also been referred to the board of audit for settlement.

The payment of these claims in cash, or even the difference (say 30 per cent.) between bonds and cash, from the revenues of the District, would be a serious inconvenience and loss to the District.

To recapitulate: Mr. Wright's contract differs in no respect from all other contracts of the board of public works intended to be provided for by the issue of 3.65 bonds. He has continued work thereunder with the express understanding that he did so at his own risk in respect to the examination of his accounts by the board of audit and the mode of payment.

I see no reason for making a special exception of this contract.

Very respectfully,

R. L. HOXIE,
Lieut. Engineers, U. S. A., Engineer of District of Columbia.

Hon. COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

A true copy.

FRANK T HOWE,
Chief Clerk Engineer's Office District of Columbia.

Mr. LEWIS. I will just say in reply to that document that when it was brought in here about eleven o'clock at night I desisted trying to get the bill through and waited until it was printed. I then took it to each member of the District Committee, and they unanimously ordered me to report the bill again and press it through, because it was a just act and that paper made no change in their opinion. The District Committee are unanimous in their opinion that the bill should pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following as an amendment to be added to the bill, and I call the attention of my colleague [Mr. THURMAN] and of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to it:

This act shall not apply to work done or services rendered under any contract made prior to June 20, 1874, for services rendered prior to that time.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not the act provide for that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.

Mr. LEWIS. Clearly it does. I will say to the Senator that I have seen two of the commissioners. They waited upon me and said they simply did that to set themselves right; that they had no objection and intended to make no further objection to the bill. They simply wished that paper read for the reading of which the Senator called and it has been read. Any amendment would send this bill back to the House and thereby deprive of pay a man who has carried out his contract in good faith, who has performed the work better than it has ever been done in this city before. It is simply ruin to an honest man to have him take seventy cents in the dollar for work which he performed and which the board of public works agreed to pay him one hundred cents on the dollar for. He was compelled by this contract—I have it here—to pay for this work in currency every week, which he has done, and he had to borrow money at very heavy and usurious interest in order to enable him to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the act of June 20, 1874, was passed, there was a large number of contracts outstanding and among them one for cleaning the streets. That act provided a mode of compensating for all services and work done up to that time, and under that section of the act all contracts were to be paid in 3.65 bonds. This was really an advantage to the contractors, because I believe the District would have been utterly insolvent and utterly broken up if it had not been for the passage of that act of relief. It is my deliberate opinion that that act was intended to cover all the services rendered under any contract up to June 20, 1874. I do not see any equitable ground for refusing to pay these gentlemen, who no doubt have been faithful contractors and have rendered this service honorably since that time, but it will not do for us to open up the question of compensation to contractors for work done prior to that time. I assure the Senator that this bill is so worded that it will cover the whole claim entirely for work done since and for work done before.

This act goes on to recite and declare that it shall not be construed to affect claims for services rendered like this or similar to this, and as a matter of course that will cover the whole amount due probably to this time. Now I would call the attention of my colleague to this matter and that of the Senator from Iowa who had charge of this bill, and I consider my responsibility ended. If you once open the door by which either the District or the Government of the United States is made responsible in money for work done under contracts in existence prior to the date of that act, you will involve the Government and District in nameless and innumerable claims for damages.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the language in the fifteenth line of the bill:

The amount and value of said work done since the passage of the act, with legal interest, &c.

"Since the passage of the act," referring to the act of June 20, 1874.

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly, that is there.
Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.
Mr. LOGAN. It certainly is.
Mr. THURMAN. If I can have the attention of the Senate a moment I will try and straighten this matter out. This bill very probably, as suggested, is only to pay in cash for work done since the 20th of June, 1874, when the act of Congress passed; but that is not the difficulty. I am a little fearful that this bill is too broad and places an interpretation upon that act which never was intended. The act of June 20, 1874, did not require payment in these 3.65 bonds either for work done previously to the passage of that act or for work which should be thereafter done. On the contrary, it left the contractor his option to take the 3.65 bonds or to get his money from the treasury of the District whenever there should be the money in the treasury of the District. He either took his chances of getting the money when the treasury should be able to pay it, whenever that might be, or took his 3.65 bonds as soon as his account could be audited. There was no coercion about it. To compel them to take the 3.65 bonds would have been the exercise of a power that I should not be willing to claim for Congress, the power to break a contract; but the option was given to them either to take the 3.65 bonds or to wait until there should be funds in the treasury applicable to the discharge of their claims, and then they would get payment in cash or in currency.

This case, however, met the commissioners almost as soon as they entered upon the discharge of their duties. To this I ask the particular attention of the Senate, because herein I think is the danger of this bill. The question immediately came before the commissioners "are we authorized to use 3.65 bonds to pay for an indebtedness that will hereafter be incurred upon contracts that have previously been executed?" There was no question that so far as indebtedness of the District had accrued upon contracts previously to the act and which were to be audited by a board of audit, the 3.65 bonds might be issued to pay for them; but as the act contemplated that certain works of improvement might be completed, as it was seen, for instance, that the work on certain sewers could not be stopped, that it would be ruinous and a great loss to stop that work, the question arose with the commissioners at once, "will this statute bear the interpretation that in respect to work yet to be done upon these contracts we may pay in 3.65 bonds for such future work."

That was resolved upon advice. They took legal advice upon the subject and came to the conclusion, as I understand, that the law would bear that interpretation. It was a question therefore with the contractors whether they would give up their contracts because there were no funds in the District treasury to pay for future work, or whether they would go on and execute their contracts and receive payment in the 3.65 bonds in case there should be no money in the treasury. I do not know whether any of the contractors threw up their contracts or not. I know that divers of them concluded to go on and take pay in these 3.65 bonds, and I know from further information that divers contractors who had never done a stroke of work upon their contracts before the passage of the act of June 20, and never intended to do anything upon them because of the inability of the District to pay them in anything but their yellowbacks and greenbacks, which were down to sixty cents on the dollar, or less, they all at once became very anxious to go on and execute their contracts when they found they could be paid in these 3.65 bonds.

Now what I apprehend is, that if this bill should pass, placing an interpretation upon that law and this man is paid in cash, every one of the sewer contractors, and everybody else who has gone on upon the theory that he was to be paid in 3.65 bonds for work done after June 20, 1874, will make a like claim as this contractor.

Mr. LOGAN. Going upon the theory that the Senator from Ohio states, this man ought not to be deprived of his claim. The Senator from Ohio states that according to the construction given to the act the contractors could take their pay in 3.65 bonds or give up their contracts and get their pay in stock.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?
Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. THURMAN. The objection to this bill is that it is a bill interpreting a statute; and instead of interpreting it as it was really intended, to give them the option or let them take their pay in cash whenever they could get it, this bill places an arbitrary construction upon it that it was intended to pay them in cash.

Mr. LEWIS. The only objection to paying Mr. Wright, as Governor Dennison told me himself, and so did Mr. Mullett, was that they saw no law by which they could pay him anything else than 3.65 bonds.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes; that is it.
Mr. THURMAN. That is a mistake.
Mr. LEWIS. Then it is a mistake of Governor Dennison's.
Mr. THURMAN. There is no law that puts them under that obligation.
Mr. LEWIS. That is just what Governor Dennison said.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as the Senator has suggested his theory about it, it is not a construction of that act at all. If the Senate will give me their attention, I will say that this is not a construction of the act except in one particular, and that is this: that the sweeping and cleaning of the streets belongs to the incidental expenses of a city. If there is any man who knows anything about a city or anything else who can suggest that the sweeping and cleaning of streets is not a part of the incidental expenses of the city, I would like to know what it is. It is so regarded everywhere, and the only construction which is placed on the act is that that class of work—not the throwing or filling up of the streets—is part of the incidental expenses of a city. That is correct; and if the statute did not mean that, it certainly ought to, because that is the fact.

There is another thing that ought to have some weight upon the Senate. This man, Colonel Wright, came here under a contract with the city, to be paid in money. He brought all his apparatus, amounting, I suppose, to $75,000 or $100,000 worth of property, from the city of Chicago, after making the lowest bid in money to sweep and clean the streets of the city of Washington. He has been here. His contract was in existence three months before this statute passed. He has worked at it every day of the time and kept the city clean, and has never received one cent of pay under his contract, not one dime. He has had to pay his men every Saturday night. He has had to mortgage his property and borrow money week after week for that purpose, and still he is carrying out in good faith his contract.

I do think this an outrage, a perfect outrage, upon this man or upon any man to be treated in any such manner as this, for the authorities of this or any city, after making a contract to sweep and clean the streets, to be paid at a certain time, so that his men could be paid, to leave him without a dollar and for nearly one year compel him to borrow money and mortgage his property and everything and put himself in that condition, and then refuse to pay him unless he will take 3.65 bonds. He offered to give up his contract if they would pay him; but they refused to do it. He has time and again been willing to give up the contract if they would pay him his money. They say there is no law to pay him anything but 3.65 bonds.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator understand why the commissioners do not pay him?
Mr. LOGAN. I understand——
Mr. CRAGIN. Because they have not money enough.
Mr. LOGAN. Yes; and they claim also that they cannot pay except in 3.65 bonds.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do they say they can pay? Do they understand they have a right to pay; that he is bound to take the 3.65 bonds? Do they say that this claim fails to come under the act of 1874 requiring him to take 3.65 bonds?

Mr. LOGAN. They say so, but he has tendered his contract. The contract was made three months before, and he has agreed to give it up if they will pay him, but they do not pay him. All he wants is the authority that they shall pay him.

Mr. ALLISON. The real difficulty, if the Senator will allow me, in this bill is that the commissioners, as I understand it, construe the second section of the act of June 20, 1874, as prohibiting them from paying for this service out of the ordinary revenues in their hands.

That section provides that the board—

Shall have power to apply the taxes or other revenues of the District to the payment of the current expenses thereof, to the support of the public schools, fire department, &c.

Mr. LOGAN. That is it. These are current expenses.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the sixth section provides that the contracts made with the board of public works shall be adjusted by this auditing board, and may be paid in 3.65 bonds, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, not that they shall be paid in 3.65 bonds. The real difficulty with these commissioners, as I understand it, in this case is that they have no authority under the second section of the act conferring upon them the power to pay for current services out of the current revenues of the District, because they held that this expense does not belong properly to the ordinary expenses of the District.

Mr. SHERMAN. Was this a contract with the board of public works?
Mr. ALLISON. It was.
Mr. MORTON. Still this bill could not be regarded as a construction of that act.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Indiana is correct. The commissioners claim it is not part of the incidental expenses of the city. This act only says it is, and every man who knows anything about the expenses of a city knows that it is a part of the incidental expenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. All contracts with the board of public works are constructively the current expenses of the government where made with other parties.

Mr. LOGAN. I know nothing about whom they were made by. I only know that is the contract.

Mr. ALLISON. The object of the second section was to pay the ordinary employés of the District in money. There were large arrearages, amounting to sixty or seventy thousand dollars, for labor on the streets and for laborers in the office of the board of public works under the District government. The object was to pay all that class of services in money. Now the commissioners construe this contract with this gentleman as not being under the provisions of this second section.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the claim, that it is part of the ordinary expenses of the city.

Mr. ALLISON. They claim it is not part of the ordinary expenses. Now they construe or pretend to contrue that law not to include street cleaning.

Mr. LOGAN. It is part of the ordinary expenses of the city. It was intended at the time, but that was not the view of the commissioners.

Mr. MORTON. I want to take this occasion to free my mind in regard to this whole 3.65 bond arrangement. I was not in the Senate when that bill passed, but I regarded it as a very hard measure in the beginning. I have to this day been unable to understand any ground upon which it could be justified. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] says that the creditors of the board of public works were not compelled to take these 3.65 bonds; that there was no coercion; they might take them or they might not; that they might take them or look to the time when they could be paid out of money in the treasury at par on their contracts. But that argument fails in this: that the act of Congress creating these 3.65 bonds had destroyed the government of the District, left no government except the three commissioners, and made no appropriation for paying these contracts out of money in the Treasury at par. The only provision made was to pay them in 3.65 bonds. Now this is the way I look at it: If the local government was under any obligations to pay these contracts out of sewer bonds or in any other way, it was under obligation to pay them at par according to the terms of the contract. How the Government could be under obligation to pay these contracts at all, or only to pay them at seventy cents on the dollar, I have never been able to understand. It always looked to me, amazingly like repudiation. If the Government was under no obligation to do it, then it was a mere gratuity anyhow; they might have offered to pay fifty cents or seventy cents; but assuming that the Government was bound to do it, and the Government taking the whole control of the District into its own hands, with three commissioners, depriving the people of all power and making no provision except the 3.65 bonds, it was simply saying this: "Take this now or take nothing for an infinite period of time;" and of course they would take it.

Now, one word in regard to this other matter. It does seem to me that a contract for sweeping the streets from day to day and from week to week and removing the filth and accumulations in the streets and alleys is a part of the current and ordinary expenses of the District of Columbia, whether it is to be paid for by the District government proper, by the board of public works, or by these three commissioners. The law abolished the board of public works, abolished the District government, and left only three commissioners. Therefore the payment had to be made through them, and this thing in its nature is part of the current expenses. I had supposed when a 3.65 bond was presented that that was to pay the debt growing out of the improvement of the streets, the making of those streets and pavements, and the ordinary current and running expenses. Whether those expenses were caused by a contract with the board or by a contract with the governor or the city authorities outside of the board while that government still existed, can make no difference in their nature. They are current running expenses of the District and do not belong to what a railroad company would call a construction account. A railroad company has an account of current expenses, and then it has what it calls a construction account, a very different thing; and the same analogy would hold here.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. The Senator from Indiana has touched the very point that I wanted to inquire about; and that was to ask the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Ohio who were on the committee that brought in the bill last summer whether it was the intention to class this character of work, the cleaning of the streets, as part of the indebtedness of the District government for which 3.65 bonds were to be issued. I do not so understand it. This is a current expense. You might as well charge the whole government expenses to the Government of the United States and settle it in 3.65 bonds. I should like to ask whether this contract is going on to-day, whether it is still a subsisting contract and to be paid for in 3.65 bonds until the contract is terminated and then perhaps they will let out another contract to run three years longer.

There seems to be no end to these 3.65 bonds; they go on indefinitely. Certainly cleaning the streets cannot be called the improvement of streets or the construction of anything. It is the every-day business of the city government to clean the streets and light the lamps and to carry on the business affairs of the city. The reason I apprehend why contracts were paid in 3.65 bonds was because it relieved the treasury of the District. I recollect when the commissioners entered upon their duties a large number of responsible citizens, property-owners of the city, petitioned the commissioners to abrogate the contracts for the improvement of streets, the pavement of streets, &c., that were not completed; but the commissioners said to them, "Gentlemen, you are standing in your own light in asking for that, because under the contracts as they stand the parties can go on and finish the work and we can pay in 3.65 bonds; if these contracts are abrogated to-day and new contracts are made for improving the streets, we shall have to levy a tax on the property-holders of the District to pay these expenses, whereas as it stands now you can throw it on the United States Government." I appeal to the Senator from Iowa if that is not so.

Now I want to know how it comes that the commissioners felt themselves authorized to class this contract for cleaning the streets along with the contracts for improving and paving the streets.

Mr. ALLISON. In answer to what is said by the Senator from Texas, I would reply that I do not believe it was understood at the time this law was passed whether this particular contract should be included within the second section or within the sixth section of the act. The object the committee had in reporting that bill and that Congress had in passing it was to provide that the current expenses of this District should be paid in money, and that the contracts should be made for cash prices. I did not know what particular contracts there were. The object was to provide for the current expenses, and it occurs to me that after the passage of that act street cleaning and this character of work ought to be fairly considered as the ordinary current expenses of the District.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all this bill asks.

Mr. ALLISON. But I wish to relieve my mind a moment now as I am up in reference to the 3.65 bonds alluded to by the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana says he never could understand why such a provision was made. I can tell the Senator why it was made. We found in our investigations a debt against this District of a very large amount with no means provided for its payment. We found the ordinary current expenses of this District requiring an expenditure of $3,000,000 per annum. We levied a tax upon the property of the District of 3 per cent., which the Senator from Indiana doubtless and many other Senators regarded as an exorbitant tax on the property of this District. It was a high tax. In addition to that we made an appropriation accompanying the bill of $1,300,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the payment of the current expenditures of this District.

Now, what were we to do with the eight or ten million dollars of debt that had been made by this board of public works unprovided for? We could not levy a tax to pay this debt. The people of this District could not bear such a burden in addition to the 3 per cent. that we levied upon them for the ordinary current expenses. Then what was to be done? There was but one of two things to be done. One was to appropriate $10,000,000 out of the United States Treasury and pay the debt; the other was to provide that the claims might be funded into some proper bond. The testimony before the committee was that many of these contracts were obtained at exorbitant rates. In many instances there was a specific arrangement made for the adding of 15 per cent. to the contract-price to cover deficiencies in the value of the District securities, and many of the contracts were exorbitant even before that 15 per cent. was added. The committee believed that the fairest arrangement which could be made would be to allow these people to convert their debts into 3.65 bonds at their own option, and many of them have done so. There was no compulsory provision about it.

This bond, it is true, bears a low rate of interest, but it runs fifty years; it is free from all taxation; it has the guarantee behind it of the Government of the United States for the payment of the interest and for providing a sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of the principal of the bonds. I think it was a fair and honest adjustment for the people of this District and for the Government of the United States, and that it in no sense savors of repudiation either on the part of anybody in the District or on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. I hope the vote will be taken. I promised the Senator from Vermont that there should be no discussion. I think the bill has been discussed enough. Let us have a vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. LOGAN. O, do not offer any amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia what he proposes to do with the 3.65 bonds? If you appropriate money out of the Treasury now to take up the bonds paid to these contractors, what are you going to do with the bonds?

Mr. LEWIS. I will answer the Senator that no bonds have been given to this contractor. He refused to receive them. I insist upon the vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my amendment on the opinion expressed by my colleague that the provision is in the bill already.

Mr. ALLISON. I notice in reading some of the papers that some of these people have already received 3.65 bonds. I think where they have received them and accepted them they ought to keep them. I move to add:

Provided, That this act shall not apply in cases where the bonds provided for in the act of June 20, 1874, have been received in full or partial payment for work done.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do not understand that Colonel Wright has received any bonds. He has refused to receive them.

Mr. LEWIS. He has not received a dollar.

Mr. ALLISON. I supposed this bill would apply to another case.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. If it does not, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That amendment would be eminently unjust to this claimant if the state of facts it refers to does not apply to this case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. I do not wish to say anything in regard to this bill, but I want the Senator from Iowa to explain a statement which he made, which perhaps I did not exactly understand, that we had levied a tax of 3 per cent. and appropriated $1,300,000 for the support of the District government and then funded its debt into 3.65 bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask the Senator how much it costs to run the District government a year?

Mr. ALLISON. I would say to the Senator that there was a tax of 3 per cent. levied; there was an appropriation of $1,300,000 in money; and there was a provision by which a large portion of this debt could be funded in 3.65 bonds and nearly $8,000,000 have been so funded. I suppose all these different provisions have been carried out in good faith.

Mr. WEST. That is not answering my question.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, Mr. ISAAC C. PARKER of Missouri, and Mr. R. MILTON SPEER of Pennsylvania, managers of the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 958) for the relief of J. E. D. Couzins, of Saint Louis.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4848) for the payment of Edward Hubbard for mail service; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4847) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 134) for the relief of Daniel S. Mershon, jr.; and

A bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of the report of Major C. R. Suter, Corps of Engineers, upon the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio River and New Orleans; which was, on motion of Mr. WINDOM, ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislature of Nevada, in favor of increased accommodations in the mint at Carson City, and in favor of the removal of the charge for coinage of silver and for a reduction of the charge for melting, refining, and toughening of the same; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1360) to remove the political disabilities of Philip Stockton, of the State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. DORSEY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 4746) authorizing the Second National Bank of Watkins, New York, and the State National Bank of North Providence, Rhode Island, to change their names—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 4829) for the relief of the Willow Springs Distilling Company of Omaha, Nebraska—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 4846) to remove the political disabilities of Charles W. Phifer, of Texas—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Lowell A. Chamberlain—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3912) to reduce and fix the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army, having met, after full and free conference they agree to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the bill of the House, and agree to the same.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
GEORGE E. SPENCER,
MATT W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
CLINTON D. MACDOUGALL,
WILLIAM G. DONNAN,
JAMES W. NESMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, there are some matters of an executive character which I think require the action of the Senate. I do not think there can be a better period of time to devote to them. It will require but a short time to dispose of them. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to waive that motion until I pass a little local bill. It will take but a moment, I assure the Senator.

Mr. HAMLIN. Gentlemen all around me make the same request. I should be very happy to oblige every gentleman; but it is impossible. I must insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ. While the galleries are being cleared we might pass a little bill. I ask consent to put on its passage the bill (H. R. No. 801) for the relief of L. R. Strauss, of Macon City, Missouri.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WEST. Let us hear it read.

Mr. WRIGHT. Has that bill been reported from a committee?

Mr. LOGAN. It has been. It is all right.

The bill was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The doors will be closed under the order of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at eight o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 27, 1875.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. F. M. GREEN, of Kent, Ohio.

The Clerk commenced to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. THOMPSON, (interrupting.) I have no doubt that many gentlemen on both sides of the House desire to occupy the time in discussion of the important bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.] I suggest that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The Clerk resumed and finished the reading of the Journal.

EXPENSES OF ELECTION CONTESTANTS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask consent to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be so far suspended that it may be in order at the time the sundry civil appropriation bill or the deficiency appropriation bill is under consideration in Committee of the Whole, to move an amendment thereto to pay the expenditures, in whole or part, of such parties to contested-election cases in the Forty-third Congress as the Committee on Elections may recommend.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot now entertain the motion to suspend the rules.

COMMITTEE ON AFFAIRS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Select Committee on Affairs in Mississippi, presented a report in writing, and moved that the report and the accompanying testimony be printed and recommitted, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I submit a report presenting the views of the minority of the committee, and ask that the same order for printing and recommittal be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHANGE OF NAMES OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. MERRIAM, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass with amendments the bill, (H. R. No. 4746) authorizing the Second National Bank of Watkins to change its name.

The bill was read. It authorizes, under the usual conditions, the Second National Bank of Watkins to assume the name of the Watkins National Bank.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. NILES,] was directed to report an amendment to add two sections to the bill authorizing the name of the Slater National Bank of North Providence, Rhode Island, to be changed to the Slater National Bank of Pawtucket, Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MERRIAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the title be changed so as to include both banks.

The SPEAKER. The title will be changed to correspond with the amendments to the bill.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (H. R. No. 4844) to amend the act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under the award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," approved June 23, 1874; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

E. W. METCALF.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4845) to authorize E. W. Metcalf to present his claim for the loss of the ship Delphine before the court of commissioners of Alabama claims; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

E. R. SINGLETON.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire also to report a bill to remove the political disabilities of E. R. Singleton, of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. That has already been passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am glad to hear it. I desire to present another bill for the removal of disabilities.

CHARLES W. PHIFER.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4846) to remove the political disabilities of Charles W. Phifer, of Texas; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the usual petition accompany that bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill has been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and there is a petition on file.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

DISTRICT SPECIAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. HARMER, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial relating to the amount equitably chargeable to the street-railway companies for special improvements in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and the recommendation of the board of audit to tax said companies; and the same was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WILLOW SPRINGS DISTILLING COMPANY.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 4829) for the relief of the Willow Springs Distilling Company of Omaha, Nebraska.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to credit the Willow Springs Distilling Company of Omaha, Nebraska, with such amounts as he shall find, on investigation, to be assessed against them, and still remaining payable as taxes upon grain used in excess of the surveyed capacity of their distillery during the months of September, October, November, and December, 1873, and January, February, March, and April, 1874; provided that the said Willow Springs Distilling Company shall prove, to the satisfaction of said Secretary, that the average production of spirits from each and every bushel of grain used and consumed in the production of spirits by them during the time above specified was at least three and one-quarter gallons, and that they have paid the legal tax upon all spirits produced.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I reserve my right to object until I hear an explanation of this bill.

Mr. NIBLACK. There is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending that relief be granted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask that the letter may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1875.

SIR: I herewith transmit a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, relative to an application of the Willow Springs Distilling Company for an abatement of taxes assessed against them from September, 1873, to March, 1874, inclusive, amounting to $10,105.93.

It will be seen that the Commissioner expresses the opinion that no relief can be granted by the Internal Revenue Office in such a case, but that he also believes that if the facts are such as they would appear to be from the evidence submitted, the claim is entitled to the favorable consideration of any tribunal that has power to afford relief.

I concur in these views, and likewise in the Commissioner's opinion that the parties can only be relieved by a special act of Congress.

I am, very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think there can be no possible objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NIBLACK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. On behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent that an evening session may be held this evening for the business of that committee.

Mr. COBURN. I would prefer Monday evening next.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I would add the condition that the debate which commences to-day does not run into the evening session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must object until we get the appropriation bills out of the way.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Claims, unanimously, the bill (S. No. 792) for the relief of John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Powell.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Fletcher, surviving partner of the firm of Fletcher & Powell, the sum of $1,399.35, for overdeductions made by the Government of the United States for the transportation of military supplies in the year 1865.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is this bill unanimously reported from the committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] says that it is the unanimous report of the committee.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Committee on Appropriations upon the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill may be printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. BECK. I object to any business being done until order is restored in the Hall. It is impossible for any one to understand what is going on.

The SPEAKER. That is a very good point.

The motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE was agreed to.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD, ETC.

Mr. HOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, presented a report from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to accompany the bill (H. R. No. 4547) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the act supplementary thereto, approved May 2, 1872, and the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Ocean," approved July 27, 1866; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] withdraws his objection to assigning Monday evening next to the business of the Committee on Military Affairs, with the understanding that it shall not antagonize the appropriation bills.

Mr. CESSNA. I have no objection if it does not antagonize the reports of the committees in relation to Louisiana and Alabama.

Mr. BECK. I object.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT COVINGTON, KENTUCKY.

Mr. ARTHUR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1019) to make an appropriation for a public building at Covington, Kentucky, be passed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object.

J. E. D. COUZINS.

Mr. FORT. I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of the Committee on Claims, for the passage of the bill (S. No. 958) for the relief of J. E. D. Couzins.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to J. E. D. Couzins the sum of $2,000, in full for services rendered to the Government of the United States in the detection and conviction of counterfeiters of United States Treasury notes.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN MONTGOMERY AND THOMAS E. WILLIAMS.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 951) now on the Speaker's table, for the relief of John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams, be passed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has that bill been considered by any committee of this House?

Mr. SPEER. No; but it has twice passed the Senate.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I object.

CLAIMS FOR QUARTERMASTER AND SUBSISTENCE STORES.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on War Claims a bill making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this bill is the same as the one objected to the other day for containing certain legislative provisions at the end of it. The former bill was House bill No. 4731, with the same title as this. This bill does not contain the two sections objected to in the former bill, and there is nothing in it except appropriations for the claims allowed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The claims embraced in the bill under consideration are reported to Congress under the second section of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1874.

That section is as follows:

SEC. 2. That all balances of appropriations, for whatever account, made for the service of the Departments of the Quartermaster-General and of the Commissary-General of Subsistence prior to July 1, 1872, which on the 13th day of June, 1874, shall remain on the books of the Treasury, shall be carried to the surplus fund, except such as the Auditor of the Treasury, whose duty it is to settle accounts against such appropriations shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary in the settlement of such accounts as have been reported to him for payment by the Quartermaster and the Commissary Departments pending in his office. And the Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General, and Third Auditor of the Treasury shall continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them under the act of July 4, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall make report of each claim allowed by them at the commencement of each session of Congress to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration.

I present a table showing the State in which the claims originated, with the number of claims in cash and the total amount for each State:

State.	Number of cases.	Amount.
Alabama	1	$250 00
Colorado	1	875 00
District of Columbia	7	4,135 80
Illinois	3	630 00
Indiana	1	125 00
Kansas	7	3,995 65
Kentucky	97	36,354 78
Maryland	35	10,022 20
Missouri	30	10,224 31
Ohio	1	250 00
Pennsylvania	3	393 75
Tennessee	82	40,904 17
West Virginia	11	4,443 90
Miscellaneous	1	125 00
Total	280	112,729 56

These claims will be found in House Executive Document No. 107, being letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting schedule of claims examined and allowed since June 30, 1874. These are claims which originated during the war, for quartermaster and commissary supplies. There are claims for rent arising during the war, which are provided for in one of the general appropriation bills. These will be found referred to in House Executive Document No. 113. The claim reported as from Alabama originated in a loyal State. The claimant now resides in Alabama.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4847) was received, read three times, and passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the blil was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBURN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HERNDON. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon it at present.

Mr. COBURN. Well, I will yield for five minutes further.

MEDALS FOR MEXICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. HERNDON. I ask consent to introduce and have considered at this time a joint resolution granting condemned cannon captured in Mexico to the National Association of Veterans of the Mexican War.

The joint resolution directs the Secretary of War to deliver to the first secretary of the National Association of Veterans of the Mexican War four bronze or brass condemned cannon captured by the United States Army during the war with Mexico in order to enable the said association to supply to the honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of that war appropriate medallions commemorating the victories achieved by American arms in that contest.

Objection was made.

LOWELL A. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution No. 102 for the relief of Lowell A. Chamberlain.

The preamble of the resolution states that Lowell A. Chamberlain was induced to tender the resignation of his commission of first lieutenant in the First Regiment of Artillery, United States Army, under the apprehension of being dismissed therefrom by sentence of a general court-martial, which resignation was accepted by the President of the United States, to date November 17, 1873; and that the vacancy created by the acceptance of the said resignation has been filled by promotion in regular course.

The joint resolution authorizes the President to restore the said Lowell A. Chamberlain to his position in the First Regiment of Artillery, United States Army, with the same rank and date of commission, and without forfeiture of pay, as if he had not tendered his resignation; provided that the President shall be convinced, upon an examination of the evidence in the case, that the dismissal of the said Chamberlain by sentence of the general court-martial before which he was tried would have been unjust and not warranted by the facts; and provided, further, that no vacancy which may hereafter occur in the grade of first lieutenant in the First Regiment of Artillery, United States Army, shall be filled until the number of officers in that grade in the said regiment shall be reduced to the number now allowed by law.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole was discharged, and the joint resolution read a third time, and passed.

Mr. GOOCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE TO GENERAL ZACHARY TAYLOR.

Mr. FRYE. I am unanimously instructed by the Joint Committee on the Library to report back for consideration at this time House joint resolution No. 126 for the erection of an equestrian statue in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, in honor of General Zachary Taylor, twelfth President of the United States.

The joint resolution directs the Joint Committee on the Library to contract, at a price not exceeding $25,000, for an equestrian statue in bronze of General Zachary Taylor, twelfth President of the United States, to be placed in the circle at the junction of Massachusetts avenue and Fourteenth street, northwest, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I object.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN UTAH.

Mr. SENER. I ask consent to report from Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice House bill No. 4269, providing for the payment of certain expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. SPEER. I make the point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent, and being objected to, is not before the House.

DANIEL S. MERSHON, JR.

Mr. ARCHER. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Naval Affairs, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 134, for the relief of Daniel S. Mershon, jr.

The bill provides that there be paid to Daniel S. Mershon, jr., the sum of $46,715.08, in full payment and discharge of the claim of said Mershon for work done and material furnished in the construction of the side-wheel steamer Cimarron.

No objection being made, the bill was received, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ARCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS REAPPOINTED IN THE NAVY.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from a committee of conference, made the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their amendments, and agree to the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment:

Add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That hereafter whenever any person who was mustered out as a supernumerary officer of the Army with one year's pay and allowances, in addition to the pay and allowances due him at the date of his discharge, under the provisions of the "act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870, shall be reappointed by the President an officer of the Army, such appointment shall be under and with the express condition that 50 per cent. of such officer's pay shall be stopped monthly until the sum total of the extra year's pay and allowances received by him when mustered out as aforesaid shall have been refunded to the United States.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the title of the bill, and agree that the title shall be amended so as to read as follows:

An act approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870, and to provide for repayments of certain moneys paid to officers mustered out of the Army as supernumerary but subsequently reappointed by the President.

And the Senate agree to the same.

LEWIS B. GUNCKEL,
EPPA HUNTON,
J. M. THORNBURGH,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
M. W. RANSOM,
B. WADLEIGH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. GUNCKEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDWARD HUBBARD.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to have passed at this time a bill which is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 4848) for the payment of Edward Hubbard for mail service was read. It appropriates $336.51 to be paid to Edward Hubbard, that sum being due him for the daily transportation of the mails from the post-office in Wiscasset, Maine, to the post-office at Sheepscot Bridge, from December 8, 1871, to February 11, 1873; this sum to be paid as full compensation for that service.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISIANA ELECTION CONTEST.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, presented a report on the contested-election case of Lawrence vs. Sypher, from the first district of Louisiana; which, with the accompanying resolutions, was ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

The resolutions were read as follows:

Resolved, That J. Hale Sypher was not elected a member of the Forty-third Congress from the first district of Louisiana.

Resolved, That Effingham Lawrence was duly elected a member of the Forty-third Congress for the first district of Louisiana, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I give notice that I propose to file a minority report in writing upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood that permission is granted to file the views of the minority.

PACIFIC MAIL SUBSIDY.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] be permitted at this time to present the report of the Committee on Ways and Means in regard to the Pacific Mail subsidy.

Mr. KASSON. The Committee on Ways and Means, who were directed to inquire concerning the alleged "use of money to secure the passage through Congress of an increased annual appropriation to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company in the nature of a subsidy for the transportation of the mails," have directed me to submit a report in writing, with accompanying resolutions. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] desires to report on behalf of the committee a bill on this subject.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4849) to regulate the appearance and compensation of agents and attorneys prosecuting claims or demands before Congress and the Executive Departments of the Government, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. KASSON. I desire that the report be printed and recommitted, and that a motion to reconsider be entered with the view of calling up the matter hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the right to report at any time gives the matter a stronger position than the motion to reconsider; but if there be no objection the action proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will be taken, and the motion to reconsider will be entered.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask unanimous consent to have considered at this time a Senate bill to which there can be no objection. It authorizes a colored benevolent association to sell a piece of land in order to pay a debt.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen request the reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee on Ways and Means in regard to the Pacific Mail subsidy. The resolutions will be read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. In that connection I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry: whether this motion to reconsider is privileged above the report of another committee that has leave to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. It is not so highly privileged. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a copy of the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail service be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives to be by him laid before the House at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, to the end that they make further inquiry and take due action upon the questions affecting William S. King and JOHN G. SCHUMAKER, and further proceed therein as they shall deem just.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House transmit to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia a copy of the evidence taken before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail service, with direction to lay so much of the same as relates to the truth of the testimony given by William S. King and JOHN G. SCHUMAKER before the grand jury of said District for such action as the law seems to require.

Resolved, That any reporter or correspondent, having a seat in the gallery by permission of the Speaker, who has received any fee, bribe, or reward in connection with any legislation pending in either House of Congress, should be deprived of such privilege; and such conduct as disclosed by the evidence taken before the Committee on Ways and Means is severely censured by the House.

Mr. KASSON. It is necessary for me to add that the last three or four pages of the report state the facts upon which the resolutions are based, and are necessary to understand properly the reason of the resolutions. I will state further that the two employés of the House whose connection with the subject is recited in the evidence have already resigned, and that is the reason given in the report for not offering resolutions upon that part of the case.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

Mr. COBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] is entitled to the floor on the bill reported from the Special Committee on Affairs in Alabama.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Indiana said he would yield to me to introduce my bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has any limitation of debate been agreed to?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Indiana consent to allow me to take an hour at this time for the purpose of disposing of the Louisiana resolutions, and then this matter can go on at the end of the hour?

Mr. COBURN. I should be glad to consent, but cannot do so.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman has no right to consent.

The SPEAKER. He has the same right as any other in giving unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. But that only; and that unanimous consent cannot be had, for I will object.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I desire to give notice that as soon as the pending question is disposed of I shall endeavor to introduce those resolutions and press them to a vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman fram California [Mr. LUTTRELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. The understanding I presume is that the vote is to be taken between one and two o'clock to-day.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOK.]

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, representing one of the States of this Union for which special legislation is now sought to be provided by the rules of the House and the organization of its committees, I have been driven from pillar to post, begging for a few minutes from one or the other members entitled to the floor, that I might get a chance to defend my State against charges and accusations which have been made, either in misconception of the facts——

Mr. COX. I call for the preservation of order.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will resume their seats and preserve order.

Mr. COOK, (continuing.) Accusations, sir, which have been made in utter ignorance of the facts and of the true condition of affairs in that State, or have been made for a worse purpose, which I do not believe.

It was charged in the discussion last night by several gentlemen that great outrages and multiplied crimes were committed in the State of Georgia, and the attempt was made to hold the whole people of the State responsible for them; that a republican or a colored man was denied his rights and privileges before the courts and could not get that justice which the law entitled him to. I say—and I have the statutes of Georgia here, and challenge comparison with any other State in this Union for the conservatism of its laws for the protection of electors, for the protection of the ballot-box, and for the security of life and property in that State—to-day peace prevails throughout our State, and men are protected in their lives and property as securely as in any other State in the Union.

One gentleman stated last night there were one hundred and fifteen thousand colored voters in the State of Georgia and that but forty thousand voted. I do not know where he derived his facts. I hold in my hand the return of the comptroller-general of Georgia, made last January, in which he showed there are only eighty-five thousand colored voters in that State and one hundred and fifteen thousand white voters. I wish to state this fact, and I ask the attention, not of violent, hot-headed politicians, but of the business men who desire the peace and quiet and order of the country. I ask attention to a statement made under official oath of the condition of the colored men in my State, and challenge anybody to show the same class of people in any other State of this Union with a greater amount of property than the colored people of Georgia. The colored people in the State of Georgia own 338,709 acres of land—homesteads they have bought since they became free. They own city and town property to the amount of $3,513,809. They own in the aggregate property in the State of Georgia in their own right to the amount of $6,157,798, and they pay a tax upon this six millions of property of $30,798. This people left destitute, without a dollar ten years ago, have in this short period of time accumulated this vast amount of land, 338,709 acres, and other property to the amount of over $5,000,000, and they would have had $333,000 more but for the Freedman's Bank. This is the moral of it: that in my State where they did not feel secure they would not invest their money in property as they do in Georgia.

I will state another fact, that a large number of these people do not want to vote.

In most cases when the colored man becomes a property-holder in the State of Georgia, buying a homestead alongside of white men, he allies himself with the democratic party. He says, "The white man will protect alike his property and mine." Whenever the colored man buys a horse or a mule he does the same, and as they advance in education they do it. It is so throughout our entire State; and this accounts for the amount of property which they have acquired in our State and the homesteads on which they live to-day. I say that no hostile feeling is felt toward the colored man on account of his right to vote.

In 1865, in November, before ever Congress had assembled, I attended the convention called by President Johnson for reconstruction. The thirteenth amendment was adopted by the State of Georgia. In that convention we gave the colored men every right of property and every right of personal protection. We gave them the right to go into the court. We protected the colored man in his marriage rights. To-day by the laws of that State he has every right on the face of the earth that I have.

I was asked last night by a gentleman from Pennsylvania how it was that out of the thirty-four prosecutions in Georgia in the Federal courts under the enforcement acts there were only six convictions. I said it was because the parties were not guilty. I state on my personal knowledge that three-fourths of those juries in the State of Georgia in the last five years have been republicans, and the majority in many instances colored men who could neither read nor write. In my own county, with an intelligent white population of one thousand, four colored men and one Federal officer were summoned to attend as the juries of the Federal courts, and there was not on those juries a white man or a democrat. And yet out of the whole number of prosecutions in the Federal courts you see what was the number of convictions; the accused being brought before the republican judge, prosecuted by a republican district attorney, and tried before a republican jury.

I say that every charge, every accusation, every insinuation, I care not who makes it or where it comes from, that there is hostility between the white and the colored races of the State of Georgia, or that the colored race are denied their equal rights, their equal privileges, is untrue in fact, and such charges only show an utter ignorance of the condition of affairs.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PIERCE.]

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a privileged question. I call again for the reading of the one hundred and thirty-fourth rule, relating to the privilege of the floor.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Doorkeeper to see that that rule is enforced. The Chair will remark that he thinks it is a very great abuse that gentlemen should come upon the floor by the courtesy of the House to abuse the privilege by making such a noise as to prevent members from hearing the discussion.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I deplore the introduction of this measure into this House in the last hours of an expiring Congress; for in my judgment it is ill-timed, unnecessary, and worse than useless. Impressed with its injustice and impolicy, I should fall short of my duty did I content myself with giving a silent vote against it. It is a political measure, intended, as its advocates aver, to secure in the country the ascendency of the political party to which they belong. To this end it provides for the increase of the power of the President, and clothes him with additional authority to interfere in the internal affairs of the several States. For one I am opposed to this increase and to this interference. Nothing but an exigency of the gravest character would justify special legislation of this kind at the very close of the session of a House of Representatives that is to be succeeded by one of adverse political opinion.

Are we not at the bottom working simply and solely for the continuance of political party supremacy? Are we not aiming, or do not those who advocate this bill aim, if not exclusively, mainly at party success by this instrumentality? Is not that in fact the motive to the introduction of the bill? Sir, gentlemen know it is. We are told, by high authority, that one hundred and thirty-eight electoral votes of the reconstructed States rightfully belong to the republican party; and that if the bill now pending in the House becomes a law it will secure these votes to that party, and otherwise they will be lost.

The pretense of redressing personal grievances and protecting individual liberty by this bill is not sufficiently plausible to free the action of its supporters from this criticism. I assert, Mr. Speaker, that we have ample legislation already; sufficiently rigorous and effective laws to accomplish all that is necessary in the Southern States. The Revised Statutes not only permit, but by implication enjoin upon the President and subordinate authorities the suppression of insurrectionary manifestations; the protection of the States against domestic violence and the rights of citizens in the exercise of suffrage. Why, then, add to the laws this extreme power, these extreme penalties? Are we mindful that constitutional liberty has meaning or force? Do we consider the States as provinces of the General Government that we may obtrude upon them at our pleasure our officers, civil and military, sending them all through the country with utter disregard for their authorities?

If domestic violence exists in the Southern States, the President is empowered to crush it. He has exercised his powers in Louisiana, Arkansas, and other States; and certainly order and tranquillity reign in Arkansas and in Louisiana. We hear of none but political troubles to-day. And yet in the midst of peace we propose to enact a new force bill, with cruel and unusual penalties, and to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, that great writ of personal privilege and personal protection, that sole and simple barrier between liberty and despotism that distinguishes this nation and Great Britain from all other nations of the world.

Sir, it is not in the interest of the republican party that this should be done. The people I more immediately represent and the people of Massachusetts as well ask for no such violent remedy. They do not believe the occasion for it exists; and with all kindness toward those who are managing and urging this measure, I say that I doubt if in their heart of hearts these gentlemen believe that any such occasion exists now or is likely to arise in the future.

Unnecessary legislation is always impolitic and liable to abuse and is to be avoided; but legislation that strikes at personal rights and is also unnecessary demands the severest condemnation and will receive it when the people fully comprehend its character.

If any one dreams he can escape this judgment in the present case, he labors under a delusion that his constituents and the country at large will speedily dissipate.

Sir, I protest against this measure, and especially do I protest against this suspension of the writ of habeas corpus either now or in the future upon contingencies which it is assumed may arise. The liberties of the people should not be so trifled with. Better far that we endure a few calamities, a few hardships, than imperil the nation; and I ask if the nation is not put in peril when it is subjected to military authority in time of peace or when only inconsiderable districts of the country are disturbed.

The power to suspend is co-extensive with the country, and is limited only by the discretion of the President. Do gentlemen understand the effect of this suspension? Do they know that when the writ is suspended a person arrested by the military forces of the United States and incarcerated, can obtain no relief except by court-martial or by the order of the President; that every passion, jealously, or caprice of the military power may be exercised without restraint?

Let us not forget the labors, cares, and difficulties that beset us in our struggles for national existence when it was necessary to suspend this writ. Let us not forget that even then many of the most patriotic and loyal citizens denounced the suspension of the writ and that nothing but the dire necessity of the hour sustained it.

Let us not forget that in the early days of the Republic this great writ was regarded as the bulwark of freedom; that down to the opening of the rebellion it had been most jealously guarded; that no discretion was left to the executive or judicial power or to any person but Congress to impair, modify, or abridge its force; and thus by law and tradition, this remedy for all, this protection for all had become surrounded by reverence, affection, and confidence. We are now asked to strike it down in an hour.

In this connection let me commend to the thoughtful consideration of those who are pressing this measure the pregnant words of that eminent jurist, Chancellor Kent, who says:

It requires more than ordinary hardiness and audacity of character to trample down principles which our ancestors cultivated with reverence; which we imbibed in our early education; which recommend themselves to the judgment of the world by their truth and simplicity; and which are constantly placed before the eyes of the people, accompanied with the imposing force and solemnity of a constitutional sanction.

In opposing this bill I am in strict accordance with all my past political action. Local self-government and the equality of all men before the law are the cardinal principles of my political faith. By these principles I stand or fall. I resisted the fugitive-slave bill because it trampled upon the principles of civil liberty and the rights of human nature. The bill now under consideration is permeated with the spirit which gave life and vigor to that odious measure.

Of the supporters of the fugitive-slave bill the most conspicuous were Jefferson Davis and John C. Breckinridge.

"The whirligig of time" presents to us to-day a most remarkable spectacle. Some of the most blatant and pretentious supporters of Jefferson Davis and John C. Breckinridge in conventions and before the people are here to-day the especial and self-constituted champions of this bill.

I shall be the last man in the world to question their consistency or dispute their motives.

Mr. Speaker, I know Massachusetts, and I have an inward assurance that I have spoken her sentiments here to-day. She has always interposed a firm resistance to the approach of arbitrary power. She resisted unto blood the stamp act, writs of assistance, and all the force bills which were enacted by Parliament to compel her submission to the British crown; she will be true to her traditions and to her history, and will resist by all constitutional means every attempt, by whomsoever made, to impose similar measures upon any portion of the people of our common country.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate something has been said in reference to the condition of affairs in the State of Arkansas. I do not now propose to say anything in reply to a word that has been said upon that subject. At the proper time both myself and my colleagues on the committee will be prepared to maintain before this House that the conclusions to which we have come and which we have reported are such and such only as can be justified under the Constitution and laws of this country.

In relation to the bill which is now before the House, I desire to state a few legal objections that I have to it; and inasmuch as this is put forth and claimed as a party measure, and there are some things in it to which I cannot give my assent, I have sought the opportunity to state my views without any argument, but to state them as propositions merely; and for the purpose of being short I have reduced them to writing.

First. I oppose the first and second sections of the bill because the offenses therein described are offenses against the State and not against the United States. Among the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution is that of "calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Invasion in this place doubtless means that of a foreign foe and by an armed military force. The authority to repel it clearly means to oppose by armed force, and to use the militia for that purpose.

In the fourth section of article 4, the "guarantee clause," the duty is devolved upon the National Government "to protect the States against invasion." In this clause probably the term invasion might well include an irruption into one State by an armed military force from another State.

The protection contemplated is by military force to drive away or destroy the invaders, and not by legislation. If it be admitted that the National Government may, under this clause, make the invasion of a State a crime against the United States, it must be an invasion in reality. It will not do to create an artificial, sham invasion by law and punish it by penalties. To make an unlawful intermeddling by two unarmed men against any State officer or State law an invasion within the meaning of the Constitution is a mere sham and farce. Under the first section an ordinary case of resisting an officer becomes an invasion, and so any interference by unlawful means with the due execution of any State law is made an invasion.

There is not in my judgment either constitutional power to get up a sham invasion for the purpose of punishing something else by calling it by that name. Nor do I believe if we had the power that there can be any necessity for Congress to assume jurisdiction over offenses which are clearly within the purview of State power and such as are punished by the laws of every State.

Second. The fourth section of the bill provides for punishing State officers for violating State laws.

I know of no authority in the Constitution which clothes Congress with any such power. I should be glad to have it pointed out. This section imposes no new duty on the State registration officers. The penalties in this section are denounced wholly against violations or neglect of the duties prescribed by the (State) registration law. Whether Congress can impose new duties on a State officer and punish him for not performing them is certainly a matter of very grave doubt ever since the decision of the Supreme Court in Prigg vs. Pennsylvania.

Third. I object to the thirteenth section, authorizing the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. It is not claimed but that the courts in all parts of the Union are open and in the free exercise of their full legal power and jurisdiction. Nor is it claimed but that the executive officers of the law can perform their duties, serve process, or make arrests anywhere or everywhere. That the laws are not well administered, that judges are partial, or that grand juries or trial juries neglect or disregard their duties, furnish no ground for the suspension of the writ.

It has never been supposed to be needful or justifiable to suspend the great writ of personal liberty except in times of great danger and violence, when the officers and tribunals of the law were powerless or so obstructed as to be practically unable to enforce laws and afford a protection to person and property.

Though I agree quite that the great changes made by the revolution and the abolition of slavery, do not yet run smoothly, and there yet remain many of the bitter dregs of slavery working wrong and violence, yet I see no remedy for them by the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. There seems to be great confusion in the minds of many gentlemen as to the effect of a suspension of the writ. It confers no power on the President or any other official to arrest anybody, or to try anybody. Its only effect is to prohibit all courts from nqu iring into the legality of arrests and imprisonments made under the authority of the Government.

Is there any need of thus prohibiting judicial inquiry into the legality of arrests and imprisonments? The reasons ought to be urgent. It has been suggested that the State courts and judges hostile to the enforcement of the national laws can by the use of this writ release everybody arrested by Federal officers. But it is now well settled that a State court or judge has no legal jurisdiction to inquire into the validity of arrests made under Federal law by Federal officers. Federal judges only can exercise the jurisdiction. Is there so great danger that the courts and judges of the nation cannot be trusted? I cannot believe there is now or is likely to be any such condition of things as to justify it.

My opposition to this section does not in the slightest degree imply distrust in the prudence or patriotism of the present Executive. I would trust him with the power as readily as any President we have had; but the right of the citizen to have the question of his right to personal liberty examined and decided should only be denied when the national safety is itself in peril. The remainder of the bill is substantially the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, known as Judge WHITE'S bill, and I shall cheerfully support it; but we never dreamed of such remedies as this bill proposes, and for one I cannot support them.

I will now hear the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont this question: whether, in his judgment, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus would give the effect of trial by court-martial of unoffending citizens?

Mr. POLAND. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My colleague on the other side appeared to think it would.

Mr. HERNDON. Would it have that effect on offending citizens.

Mr. POLAND. It makes no difference in the law about trying anybody.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman from California yield to me one minute?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I cannot yield more of my time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire only a single minute.

I desire to say that I concur substantially with everything that has been said by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and the clearness and ability of his statement relieve me from making any speech of my own upon this question, with one single exception. I think the policy of the statute of 1871, known as the Ku-Klux act, which the gentleman from Vermont helped to frame, was wise; that it was approved by the entire country; that it suppressed a great evil, menacing alike the personal security and the right of suffrage of citizens. I think there is a portion of the country where a similar danger now exists and has been ascertained.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Is this coming out of my time?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask the gentleman merely to allow me to finish my sentence. I was saying that I think there is a portion of the country where a similar danger now exists, as found not merely by the report of the three gentlemen who signed what has been called the minority report on Louisiana, but as found in that portion of their report which two more of their associates have authorized the statement to the country they would gladly concur in.

I should be glad if a bill could be framed so defining and limiting the territory, defining and limiting cautiously the time, defining and limiting also cautiously the occasion, which could give power to meet this contingency, such as proved effective in suppressing the Ku-Klux violence in 1871.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Does this bill do it?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It does not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But my amendment does.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Speaker, it is universally conceded that we have arrived at a great crisis in our national history. A turning-point in politics is at hand. Thousands upon tens of thousands of unprejudiced men of high repute are announcing their emancipation from party ties which for years have bound them together in the closest political and partisan relationships.

It is a time for retrospect, review, and calm consideration. It is a time when the representatives of the people, above all others, should manifest the most earnest spirit and undoubted patriotism. However humble my position as a member of the democratic party, I ask for myself and my constituents that the true story of our national life shall be told; that the people shall know who are responsible for the good and evil that is now prominent on the record; that the evils may be remedied, and the benefits extended.

To-day peace and prosperity have forsaken one section of our beloved land. The cry of woe and almost of war has sounded in certain States of the South. Business is stagnated and depressed. The whole land feels the curse of misrule. The workshops of the North are closed, the fields of the South uncultivated. In our great cities the skeleton Want stalks with deadly tread through many a household. The great products of our land are carried in foreign vessels. Our shipping industries are dead; our mercantile industries almost suspended; our manufacturers, mechanics, and artisans idle. The whole combined industries of our nation seem paralyzed.

The question comes to us as the Representatives of the people, What are the causes for the existing state of affairs, and is it not our bounden duty to ascertain the same, and, if from error and neglect, to apply the remedy?

It will be beneficial, I think, to recall the fact that at the commencement of our existence as a Republic the burden of the national debt and expenditures was less than one dollar per capita, and so it remained for more than a quarter of a century. As property increased in value, and in just accordance with the increasing wealth of the individual, the per capita amount of debt and expenditure gradually increased until 1861, when the tax was but two dollars per capita. Hence there was no general complaint of the burdens of government and no suspicion of dishonesty founded solely on this advance of outlay for the maintenance of our political institutions.

In 1861 rebellion stalked with giant tread throughout our land. The exigencies of those years of strife are conceded. Far be it from my motives to criticise or censure the conduct of affairs in that trying period. There was a tremendous but necessary draft upon the purses of the people, and expedients for raising money were resorted to by the Administration, which I do not now call in question.

At the close of the war our debt had reached the sum of $2,680,647,689, or about $78 per capita.

When civil strife ended, it was the evident duty of those in power to sum up the indebtedness and begin administrative action upon a policy of close economy, and with a purpose to protect the rights and liberties of the conquered. This was the manifestly proper course to pursue, and every assurance was given by the party in power that congressional legislation should conform to such a purpose and plan.

At the commencement of the first term of President Grant taxation averaged sixty dollars per capita, and the people were told by most emphatic declarations from the dominant party that year by year the direct and indirect levy upon the tax-payers would be marked on a descending scale.

Has the Administration carried out those promises? To-day we see the revenues of the country insufficient to meet the expenditures, and this Congress has been appealed to to increase the tax-list some $40,000,000 in order to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government.

Without taking up the excuses which have been offered in this House for the present condition of affairs, I shall now proceed to consider the causes of that condition and place the blame where it properly belongs—the republican party.

In spite of the debt created by the war, in spite of the depressing influences it has established, the republican party, instead of seeking economy in public expenditure, has given away to monopolies and private combinations 212,164,846 acres of the public domain, or an area of territory larger than the original thirteen colonies.

It has taken millions of dollars from the hard earnings of the people and paid them to private combinations and wealthy corporations, while millions of poor men and women are walking the streets of our great cities begging for bread, and thousands of maimed soldiers and honest creditors of the Government have waited year after year for the payment of pensions and honest claims.

It maintains a large standing army in the South at an expense of nearly fifty million dollars a year, in order to carry States for the republican party, while daily we hear of outrages upon our frontier on account of but little protection being afforded by our Goverment.

It has usurped by the force of the bayonet the State authority of Southern States, establishing a despotism unheard of in the annals of civilization.

It seats and unseats at will legislators of sovereign States, and exercises a power more despotic than monarchs.

It is responsible for "Black Friday" speculations, Credit Mobilier frauds, Sanborn contracts, and contract finance company's steals, whereby millions of money have been wrung from the business men of the country and the hard earnings of the poor.

It is responsible for the Indian ring frauds and postal ring peculations, whereby the Government and people have been plundered of hundreds of millions of dollars.

It is responsible for the increase of the civil list from forty-four thousand five hundred employés in 1860 to nearly eighty-seven thousand in 1875, at a cost to the Government of millions of dollars.

It has instituted a system of espionage and oppression in the execution of the revenue laws, which robs the people and enriches the official at the expense of the public Treasury.

It maintains direct taxation, and proposes to still further tax the necessaries of life and products of labor, while it upholds and maintains an army of cormorants in high places and official position.

It exempts the rich man's bonds from taxation, while it taxes the poor man's salt and the widow's pension.

Its spies and informers in all parts of the country desolate homes and drag their inmates, cuffed, chained, and beaten, hundreds of miles on mere pretense or the accusation of such spies and informers, (devils incarnate,) who do the bidding of the Attorney-General.

This is the work of that great party of progress; who in their efforts to elevate the black race have degraded and impoverished the white, and blinded by political prejudice have crushed out the liberties of the States of the South.

I appeal to members of this House, irrespective of party, to view this vital and most important question from a citizen stand-point, and give to those States which you have crushed by taxation and iniquitous laws the power to lift themselves up from out the darkness to prosperity, wealth, and future greatness.

As showing the efforts made by leaders of the republican party to still further increase the nation's indebtedness and add to the burdens of the people, I append the following tables, compiled from the statistics of the Government:

Year.	Gross receipts.	Expenditures.
1800	$12,451,184	$11,989,739
1820	20,881,493	21,763,024
1840	25,032,193	28,226,533
1860	83,371,640	77,055,075
1870	696,729,973	703,155,391
1874	744,238,600	724,698,933

Expenditures—Navy, War, and Indian Departments.

Year.	Navy.	War.	Indian.	Total.
1800	$3,448,716	$2,560,878	.....	$6,009,594
1820	4,387,990	2,630,392	$315,750	7,333,952
1840	6,113,896	7,155,204	2,271,857	15,540,957
1860	11,514,649	16,472,202	2,991,121	30,977,972
1870	21,780,229	57,655,675	3,407,938	82,843,842
1874	30,932,587	42,313,927	6,692,462	79,938,976

In four years, from 1870 to 1874, the expenditures of the Navy Department have increased nearly 50 per cent., and of the Indian Department nearly 100 per cent. This needs no comment. It appeals to the pockets of the taxpayers, who will govern their future political action in the selection of men who will administer the affairs of Government on an economical basis. In order that the people may know what it costs to keep an army of Government officials, I append a statement showing the annual salaries paid to maintain the principal Departments in Washington.

Treasury Department	$2,669,424 37
State Department	84,909 42
War Department	627,187 74
Navy Department	123,458 21
Post-Office Department	441,158 09
Agricultural Department	76,924 00
Department of Justice	125,750 03

While thus adding to the expenditures of the General Government, as shown by the preceding tables, its agents in the South have involved those States in enormous debt, and have collected in the shape of taxes and plunder under carpet-bag and negro rule millions of money. The Government has become the mere tool of adventurers, at whose hands the people of the South expect no mercy.

The indebtedness of the South to-day is over $300,000,000; and the people, not the administration, must pay the debt.

What have the leaders of the republican party to answer for the iniquity they have heaped upon a conquered people?

With political morality dead; with a party made up in the South of parasites, plunderers, and adventuers, is it not time that the people should rise en masse, as they virtually have done, and demand a change? Public officials have abused their trust and lowered their political integrity. Peculation is a synonymous term with "carpet-bagism." Men have robbed the Government and shared the spoils with those in power. Pardons have been granted to noted criminals, and those same criminals have been placed in positions of trust and honor as soon as their release was effected. The Government has sanctioned corruption and encouraged those engaged in robbing the people.

Before the year 1862 the Government had been burdened with ten successive wars, and yet in 1861 our public debt was but $64,000,000 and our expenditures but $54,952,957. To-day our debt is over $2,000,000,000, and our expenditures nearly $800,000,000.

In 1860 our military establishment cost but $16,000,000; to-day it costs nearly $50,000,000.

Our Navy in 1860 cost but a little over $11,000,000; to-day it costs over $30,000,000. In 1861 our expenditures for Indian affairs amounted to but $2,865,481; to-day the expenditures are nearly $7,000,000, not over 20 per cent. of which sum ever reaches the poor Indian.

Our population in 1860 was 31,183,744 and in 1870 38,115,641; an increase of 22 per cent. It is estimated that our increase in expenditures from 1860 to 1870 is nearly 100 per cent.

On the basis of the census of 1860, it has been estimated that the gross value of the annual product of the people amounted to a fraction over $3,000,000,000. In ten years, say, in round numbers, $30,000,000,000. Of that total it appears by the ascertained receipts of the administration party that they have taken from the people in actual cash, two-thirds by taxation, the residue by loans, from 1861 to 1871, the appalling sum of $10,803,307,811, or during the last preceding ten years the equivalent of 33⅓ per cent. or full one-third part of the gross estimated value of the entire annual product of the people on the basis of the census of 1860, and during the six years from 1865 to 1871 the sum of $6,132,880,296. And of that total of treasure they have expended from 1861 to 1871 $10,155,028,917, and from 1865 to 1871 the sum of $5,587,610,202; leaving the people still burdened with a debt the annual gold-bearing interest of which is not less than $125,000,000.

"In the year 1871 the Army of the United States, composed of thirty thousand enlisted men, cost the people $44,080,084, or at the rate of $1,469.33 for each and every soldier, while the royal army of Great Britain, composed of one hundred and thirty-five thousand men, four and a half times greater, cost that government only $64,825,000, or at the rate of $480 for each soldier."

These facts I leave for the digestion of my republican friends, and turn my attention now to Alabama, Louisiana, South Carolina, Arkansas, and other States of the South, and will endeavor to show, as far as I am able, that the necessity for the passage of any such iniquitous caucus measure as now proposed does not exist.

Now as to affairs in Alabama. The majority of the committee have presented a report based on evidence, as I will prove to you, of the worst character.

The witnesses called by the majority were mainly negroes, Federal office-holders, defeated aspirants, and in many instances criminals and men of no character or standing in the community; while the witnesses called by the minority included lawyers, judges, governors, doctors, planters, and men of the highest respectability, without regard to political views.

The minority of the committee at the commencement of the examination protested against receiving hearsay evidence, but their protest was utterly disregarded, and evidence admitted which would have been ruled out of any court of the United States or State jurisdiction.

At Opelika the witnesses all testified to no intimidation on the part of democrats or conservatives. Lieutenant Taylor, United States Army, testified that the whites were peaceably disposed toward the colored men, and that no negroes were prevented from voting except through their own carelessness in not reaching the polls in time, and which were kept open until sundown and after. He also stated that the negroes, instead of voting and going home, stood round the polls, and made it difficult to approach the place of voting. (See Testimony, 128.)

As showing that the only intimidation was on the part of republicans, I call your attention to the testimony of Robert Bennett, colored, page 58, in which he swears that he was turned out of church, his life threatened, his children turned out of the public school and beaten, because he voted the democratic ticket and belonged to a democratic club.

He also testified to bacon being offered him if he would vote the republican ticket, and if he did not, Mr. Isaac Heyman told him he would lose his ears and be thrown back into slavery.

I append a portion of his testimony:

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. Did Mr. Heyman ever tell you if you voted the democratic ticket you would be taken back into slavery?

Answer. Yes, sir; he told me that two or three times.

Q. Did he offer you five dollars to vote the republican ticket last fall?

A. He offered it to me himself; he sent me the money by one of my men.

Q. When?

A. Just before the election last fall.

Q. Are you a property-holder here?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What reasons have you, in addition to the reasons you have given, for voting the democratic ticket?

A. I wanted to get the taxes down. I knew that I could not hold the property according to wages and taxes; that is one reason why I done it.

Q. Did you notice any disturbance about the polls during the day of voting here?

A. I did not see a bit.

Q. Do you find the whites, as a general thing, kindly disposed toward the colored men?

A. They are.

Q. Do you know of any suits being brought by colored men against white men?

A. No, sir; I don't believe I know of any.

Q. You have not been at law to any extent yourself?

A. No, sir.

Q. You are getting along quietly and peaceably with your white neighbors?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do they pay you for your work?

A. They do.

Q. Do they keep their contracts with you?

A. Yes, sir; and I goes along with them just as well as I know how; me and my family.

Q. Your trouble has been with your colored men?

A. It has not been with the worldly people; it has been with my brothers in the church that has caused all my trouble.

Q. You have been trustee of your church eight or nine years?

A. Yes, sir; trustee and steward together; they turned me out the steward's place, and turned me over to a trustee, because the pastor thought the steward had a little more power.

Q. Did any colored republican ever make any threats against your life?

A. They shot holes in my house.

Q. In this town?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it before or after the election?

A. Before the election.

Q. Did they show any cartridges or ammunition?

A. Yes, sir; one of the trustees went and bought cartridges, and me and him went right over there to the calaboose, and showed me a box, and threatened to stick every one of them cartridges into me.

The testimony of Alfred E. Lightfoot, colored school teacher, shows that bacon was used for political purposes, and that because he would not vote the republican ticket he was persecuted, his school locked up, and that he was insulted, and every threat offered him on the streets. To use his own language, he was "hunted like a rabbit before hounds."

Stephen H. Tucker, aged sixty-eight years, a republican, and for seven years clerk of the circuit court at Opelika, testified that the republican sheriff proposed to him to import five hundred colored voters from Georgia to carry the republican ticket.

Adam Kirk, colored, (p. 106,) testified that he was beaten for voting the democratic ticket, and that he and other colored men were informed by McLemore, Hubbard, Betts, the radical candidate for Congress, Heyman, and others, that they would be thrown back into slavery unless they voted with the republican party.

Sam Keller, colored, (pp. 116, 117,) testified that he was driven from the church, his children beaten and driven from school, on account of his voting the democratic ticket, and that wives were induced to leave their husbands for so voting, and that bacon was used for political purposes.

Washington Jones, colored, (p. 135,) testified to voting the republican ticket, and being promised by Mr. Heyman and other republicans bacon, a horse or mule, and forty acres of land the day after election.

Mr. Carpenter, colored, testified that the Colored Women's Association was headed by one John O. D. Smith, a republican white man, and its object was to induce colored women to leave their husbands if they voted the democratic ticket.

Irvin Drake, colored, (p. 195,) testified that he helped to haul the bacon the day before the election; there were three wagons hauling it; it was taken to the church, cooked, and distributed to the colored republicans.

Rev. Philip Allison, colored, presiding elder of the Methodist Episcopal church, testified (p. 202) to charges being preferred by several ministers in his circuit against members of their churches for voting the democratic ticket, and that these members would have been turned out of church, but he as presiding elder put a stop to such work. He also testified that the radical leaders had deceived the colored people, and had done a great deal of injury and occasioned all the strife which now existed between the white and colored people.

Jacob Stringer, colored, (p. 142,) testified to being beaten and turned out of church for belonging to the conservative club, his wife abused, his house fired into, and his family insulted. He was promised all the bacon he wanted if he would vote for Betts, the republican candidate for Congress, and if he did not his ears would be cut off.

Lewis Neil, colored, was offered a horse or mule, forty acres of land, and the civil-rights bill if he would vote the republican ticket; and if the republicans were successful, they would divide the houses, furniture, and bed-quilts of the democrats among the negroes.

In addition to other testimony, Congressman PELHAM testified to being compelled to leave Tuskegee on account of threats made, &c., while Judge Meaders testified that PELHAM had admitted to him that he left voluntarily, not being compelled to do so. I leave the question of veracity to these two gentlemen. So much for the PELHAM outrage.

It was shown by the testimony of many witnesses at Opelika that Heyman had used the name of President Grant as authority for asserting that the negroes would be thrown back into slavery if they voted the democratic ticket; that about twelve thousand pounds of bacon were distributed at Opelika, at least seventy-five miles from any overflowed country, in order to carry Betts's election, and that one of the most important witnesses, Charles Liscomb, the man who had hauled the bacon, was taken out of the country in order to prevent his testimony from being given.

The only ostracism complained of by any white man was by Dunbar, the keeper of a low groggery, and who complained that he was not patronized by white men, his only customers being negroes.

Isaac Heyman, who figured so largely at Opelika, was one of the first to join the rebellion, and was engaged during the war in hunting down Union men through the mountains. He is now a leading republican and office-holder under the Administration.

John O. D. Smith, the white leader of the colored woman's club, deserves to rank well among white citizens, and his valuable aid could no doubt be secured in other States to organize women's clubs, especially where the colored element predominates.

The worst testimony taken at Opelika was in regard to the burning of two churches, but as to who were the burners the testimony is very conflicting. The negroes were led and being organized at midnight meetings by a notorious colored outlaw by the name of Sharp, and in consequence of these meetings the white men moved their families for fear of danger. The burning was deplored by all respectable citizens, irrespective of party, and it was shown by the testimony that the democrats proffered material to rebuild the churches the next morning, having furnished the material in the first place with which the churches were built.

To sum up at Opelika: A careful examination of the testimony will show that the only intimidation was by colored republicans against colored democrats, who, under the influence of white men, drove them from the churches, the streets, and the school-houses; that even the sanctity of homes was invaded and the church made subservient to the will of the radical leaders. The testimony of these colored men is fully corroborated by such men as Hon. William H. Barnes, Judge Meadors, Colonel Frank Watkins, Mr. Tucker, and citizens of the highest respectability, irrespective of party.

At Montgomery a large number of witnesses were called, and as sworn to by every witness on the stand, republican and democratic, it was shown that the shooting and killing was participated in by two factions of the republican party, the democrats taking no part in the riot in that city. And yet the majority of the committee, in summing up the evidence, fail entirely to mention the fact that the bloodshed and murder at Montgomery were occasioned by republicans only. Is it not remarkable that Mr. COBURN and Mr. ALBRIGHT should overlook such an important matter, while if the democrats had been engaged in it those two gentlemen would have shed copious tears over the murders perpetrated by democrats.

In the language of the chairman at Eufaula, he wanted "red-hot testimony;" but when his witnesses told tales of murder in the camps and among the members of his own party he did not care to mention it. I believe both of the gentlemen received "red-hot testimony" at the last election that their services were no longer required as congressmen.

The character of the witnesses called by the minority at Montgomery is beyond criticism. Among them were such men as Ex-Governor Watts; the present governor, Houston; Judge Buckle, chief justice of the supreme court; Hon. Judge Rice, a man of national reputation; Messrs. Screws, Jones, and others; all of whom testified to no intimidation, no ostracism, except on the part of republicans, and no occasion for Federal interference. These gentlemen had taken part in the election, with one side or the other, and were not insulted, were allowed to deposit their votes without interruption, and assert as false the general indictment against the citizens of Alabama contained in Mr. HAYS'S letter to General HAWLEY.

My time will not permit my referring specially to the testimony taken at Montgomery, but I desire to call the attention of this House to one fact; that is, that during the last eighteen months some twenty murder trials have taken place in that city, every one of which was the murder of a colored man by one of his own race, and at the time of our visit there one hundred and twenty-five prisoners were in jail, all of whom were colored. The city and county of Montgomery is controlled by republicans, with republican judges on the bench, so that if any democrat had been guilty of crime or misdemeanor of greater or less magnitude, it was in the power of the republican party to have prosecuted him to the full extent of the law.

Turning now to Mobile, we found the same character of witnesses and the same causes leading to the commission of crime—the majority, as usual, confining the testimony to negroes, Federal office-holders, and defeated aspirants, and in no case calling a democratic witness. The minority called General Healy, United States marshal, and ex-Mayor Moulton, both leading republicans; Senator Hamilton, Mr. Brewer, the mayor of the city; and other prominent citizens, irrespective of party. Some seventy to one hundred witnesses, white and colored, testified to no intimidation and ostracism except by republicans, and that every man was protected in the free right of suffrage, so far as the conservatives were concerned. As showing the intimidation by republican negroes, I will call the attention of this House to the testimony of John Barber:

JOHN BARBER, (colored,) a witness for the minority, sworn and examined.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. State your name, age, and residence.

Anwer. My name is John Barber. I am fifty-three years of age. Reside in Mobile.

Q. How long have you lived here?

A. I was here thirty-six years before the war, and was here at the election and prior to the election last fall.

Q. Did you have any difficulty here prior to the election?

A. I did. I attended a meeting in the support of the democracy. Two or three hundred persons—a crowd of men and boys—came to break it up, crying out, "Break it up! Break it up!" They were black men. I told them we wanted no trouble, and requested them to go away. They did so, but came back again, repeating their cries. I was president of the club. They went off again, and we did not remain long after that for fear of difficulty, but adjourned the meeting, and I returned to my house, about a half mile away. While sitting by my fire, between twelve and one o'clock, I heard a noise outside, and, looking through the windows, saw about twenty-five men, who were whispering together, and who finally asked if I was in. My wife replied that I was, and they then said that Mr. Price wanted me. I did not go, when they broke open my door with axes. I had a long knife, which I took in my hand as I went to the door. Jack Throer, a republican negro, threw a brickbat at my knee. The scars of the blow show yet. After that brickbats whistled by me, and I then made my escape to the back door, but found the house was surrounded. I raised my knife and they gave way, and I made my escape to another house. As I got to the chimney outside Jack Throer flung another brickbat at me, and I then broke into the other house, which belonged to Mr. Page, hallooing, "Murder!" The negroes outside said, "Turn out the damn democrat. God damn him, we are going to kill him this night." I then crept under the mattresses in the bed in the house, when Mr. Page's wife said I must go out; that if I did not they threatened to pull his house down. Jack Throer stood at the door with a spade. My wife came to the door and told them not to kill me. They said, "Yes, they were going to kill the damn son of a bitch." Throer struck at my head with a spade, but struck my wife and cut her fingers and nearly knocked her down. After that I got away. Pete Charleston struck at me with a brickbat on the back of the head. I afterward ran to Mrs. Morris's house, and as I got into the door they threw brickbats and spoiled her door. I was at that time bleeding severely. I remained there half an hour, and in the mean time they pulled down her fence. I finally took out my knife and went out among them, and as they saw me they fired three pistol-shots, one of which hit me, and also struck me with a brickbat. Jack Throer and Matthew Taylor shot at me. I ran then down to Mr. King's house, but fell against the door and could not open it. At that time Jack Throer tried to hit me on the head, and struck me on the scalp. I cried "Murder!" and ran about ten steps, and got into Mr. Magree's house, and at that time they shot at me, and Jack Throer flung an ax over my head. I got into the house, and they asked whether those men were going to kill me. At that time I was bleeding worse than ever. They cried to them to turn me out, saying that if they did not they would pull their house down. The man of the house got his revolver, but his wife and daughter told me to get out. I went out of the back door, crept into a little box, and staid there nearly an hour. In the mean time that crowd remained around there crying, "Where is the damn democratic son of a bitch?" They searched in his door and all around the place, but could not find me. They finally went away, and I got home.

Q. Were you beaten and abused by those republican negroes because you voted the democratic ticket?

A. I was.

Q. Do you know of their beating and abusing other colored men for voting the democratic ticket?

A. They said that I had got to die. They said they had killed York Tunstill that night, and now they were going to kill me.

Q. Do you know of the republican negroes in this city being armed and having secret councils for the purpose of preventing the democratic negroes from voting?

A. I know they had what they called a company which I never would join. It was at the court-house. Those negroes threatened to burn up my wife and children after that, and I had to move them out of the second ward.

Also to the testimony of York Tunstall:

YORK TUNSTALL, a witness for the minority, sworn and examined.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. Were you here on the day of election in November?

Answer. I was.

Q. Were you here during the compaign before the election?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any trouble with the colored men of this city before the election.

A. I did. While attending the club meeting I went across the street to lunch. They came in after me. One man at the door said, "If you don't turn that damned nigger out, we will cut your door down." Another man said, "We will stay here till day." I saw two men hanging on the fence, and others were up the street, and I went out the back way and found the yard full of men. They pitched into me. I recollect Jack Throer and Spencer Davis, although I can't say Spencer Davis struck me.

Q. Who else struck you?

A. A yellow fellow whose name I don't know. I never visit them. They are all gamblers, and I am a working-man.

Q. Did they strike you on that occasion?

A. Yes, sir. There are now scars on my head, and my arm is hurt so that I cannot well move it. One man caught me by the jacket and another one by the neck. I fell from the beating they gave me, and when I recovered, Mr. Armistead, a policeman, and another man took me out of the crowd and told me to go home, as there was a large crowd around there.

Q. Did they beat you severely?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were they colored republicans who beat you?

A. Yes, sir; that is what they said.

Q. For what reason did they strike and beat you?

A. All I heard them say was to Mr. Fisher, in whose house they found me. They said, "If he didn't open his door or turn that damned York Tunstall out they would cut the door down."

Q. They whipped you because you were a democratic negro?

A. Yes, sir.

Mrs. Barber, the wife of John Barber, and a large number of white witnesses, corroborate the testimony of these two colored men. ——— ——— testified to the beating and murder of negroes at his mill for voting the democratic ticket.

In regard to the riots at Mobile, it was shown that a negro had been arrested in the morning for crime, and was being conveyed to jail by a deputy sheriff, when the negroes determined to rescue their comrade, and fired upon the deputy sheriff. In the evening, headed by Allen Alexander, one of the most notorious colored outlaws in Alabama, with six indictments for different crimes now hanging over his head, the colored men, numbering at least three hundred, rushed down the street shouting that they would take the polls at all hazards and repeat as often as they wished to. Mayor Moulton, a republican, testified that he as mayor of the city, accompanied by a squad of policemen, attempted to intercept the mob and arrest Alexander, but before he could reach him a sheriff had arrested the outlaw. Immediately upon Alexander's arrest the negroes began firing into the whites and the whites returned the fire.

This testimony is fully corroborated by Hon. John Forsythe and Mr. Rapier, both of whom were standing in a room above the street and saw the whole occurrence. And yet the chairman of the committee in his speech last night stated that the negroes were not armed, while the whole testimony shows that they fired the first shot, and that when arrested, arms were taken from Alexander and other negroes engaged in the riot. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that my duty as a Representative compels me to speak of the character of the testimony taken by the majority—confined in many instances to the most degraded and disreputable people, one of whom, Ben Lane Posey, had been convicted of a nameless crime, and which, by special request, I consented might be stricken out of the testimony. Is it strange that the people of Mobile should protest against being judged by the testimony of men who would have been spurned from any respectable society—of degraded beings, insensible to every principle of honor and justice—of negroes, schooled as to their testimony by unprincipled white men.

I call the attention of every honest Representative and citizen to the appeal of eight hundred business men of Mobile who only ask that they may be examined and tried by respectable evidence, and which I will now read:

MOBILE, January 5, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, citizens of Mobile, have learned with pain and surprise the course pursued by the majority of your committee in performing the duty assigned them. The undersigned supposed that such a committee would seek to inform themselves of the very truth by inquiring of the intelligent and impartial members of the community, and would take pains to learn that such sources of information were really open to them. The undersigned learn that, instead of pursuing that course, the majority of the committee have put themselves in communication with the local leaders of the republican party, mainly defeated candidates, and known here to be violently prejudiced against the great mass of our people, and from such source, as might be expected, have been furnished mainly with the crude and inflamed statements of ignorant colored men.

The undersigned protest against being judged in any such manner, and against having the character of this community and this people tried upon the statements of such witnesses. That is not making an impartial investigation into facts, nor is it ascertaining the truth of the matters the committee were appointed to investigate by the best evidence within the reach of the committee.

The citizens of Mobile are not disobedient to the laws. There is no design or intention by them to deprive colored men of their rights under the laws; on the contrary, they have protected colored men and will continue to protect them in their rights. The white citizens of Mobile have done no more and will do no more than, as far as they can, prevent colored men from fraudulently voting when not really entitled, and from casting repeated votes, as they have frequently heretofore done, under the influence of bad men or stimulated by their own bad passions and ignorant prejudice against the whites.

The undersigned deny that colored men are systematically injured or oppressed in their rights. They are protected in their rights; but colored men look upon restraint against the abuse by them of their rights as oppression. If the truth could be presented on its real merits, the undersigned do not hesitate to say that that is the real cause of the complaint so loudly made by them and in their name.

Very respectfully,

WM. D. DUNN,
President Board of Underwriters.
M. WARING,
Citizen of fifty-two years' standing.
E. S. PENNYMAN & CO.,
Grocers.
And others.

Hon. Messrs. A. H. BUCKNER and J. K. LUTTRELL, members of the committee of the Congress of the United States appointed to make investigations in the State of Alabama and now in Mobile.

Need I add more than this petition. Here are a brave, generous, and noble people, from whom have sprung some of the greatest minds that have controlled the affairs of our nation; their property, their homes, everything they possess or care for, is at stake. They ask only that they may be heard, and not hopelessly crushed by the evidence of degraded negroes and white men and unprincipled adventurers.

One more reference, and I am done with the Mobile testimony. The majority called James Gillette, a Federal office-holder and a man of small caliber. He testifies (p. 625) that the people of Alabama are incapable of self-government, and that that State must be governed by congressional legislation. Alabama is cursed with such whilom statesmen, carpet-baggers, and Darwinian adventurers as this man Gillette.

Contrast his testimony with that of General J. M. Withers, a leading citizen, prominent not only in State but national affairs, a gentleman of culture and high moral character:

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. Do you not think the sending of United States troops to this State was calculated to intimidate voters?

Answer. Unquestionably. Everything of that sort intimidates; and that is not all. Do not misunderstand me. These demonstrations intimidate both sides. There are a class of whites who are intimidated and there are a class of negroes who are intimidated. I saw some few negroes who were not intimidated, and who were bold and fearless, and I saw whites who I am satisfied were intimidated. That, however, is simply an opinion.

Q. Do you not think the sending of troops into this State at the last election was an outrage upon the sovereignty of the State?

A. Well, sir, that strikes precisely at an opinion of mine. I have always believed that any interference except to keep down resistance to a State Government in a State was an outrage on a State, and that is now my opinion.

Q. Then it is your opinion that the sending of these troops here was simply an outrage?

A. It was, upon anything like State rights. I do not say there was not need for a strong arm to put down lawlessness.

Q. Is there not lawlessness on the part of colored republicans against colored democrats?

A. That is my opinion, without having seen it. I cannot doubt that.

Q. Do you know anything about what they call carpet-baggers in the State; have they not been a curse to your country?

A. I believe that their influence has been most pernicious, but there have been honorable exceptions, I believe.

Q. Do you not believe that if the people of this State were let alone to manage their own internal affairs, as they have been allowed to do in days gone by, that it would be the best interest of the country and the Government, and particularly to the people of the State?

A. We have either got to go back and throw upon the people of the State the responsibility of law and order and build up a healthful public sentiment at home, or we have got to do away with the mockery of State governments and have a central power to rule the States as provinces.

Q. Then, according to your theory, the best thing we can do is to leave the government and management of the affairs of this State to the intelligence of the bona fide residents of the State and the men who have an interest in the welfare and prosperity of the State?

A. That is the only thing we can do, if we are to preserve a republican form of government. We must get rid of all extraneous influences. There are grievous ills to be corrected among ourselves. But I have gone against southern public sentiment upon that subject simply because I saw outrages that I could not as a citizen, without a public sentiment to back me, correct; and the people made a pretext that there was a power over them foreign to themselves interfering, and justified themselves in outrages which if they had been left to themselves would not have been perpetrated.

Q. If you removed these carpet-baggers, allowed the negroes to go along quietly and peaceably, and permitted the intelligence of the State to manage the affairs of the State, you think the condition of the people of the State would be better?

A. I believe that, whatever immediate ills might result, the only way to get back to a healthful public sentiment, doing justice to all, is to throw the responsibility upon the people of the State of maintaining a just and proper and honest government, or else taking the power and concentrating it in one central power to govern them as provinces. I do not wish to be understood as asserting that here among my own people there are not evils which ought to be corrected. I state that I believe they will either have to be permanently corrected by a central power crushing out all pretext of State rights or throw the responsibility upon the State, when I believe a healthful public spirit will spring up.

These are the sentiments of an honest man, and my friend General HAWLEY, of Connecticut, struck the key-note last night when he said leave "the affairs of the States to be governed by the people, who must correct the evils existing therein." These were the sentiments of a statesman and gallant soldier, which I heartily indorse, and which I hope this House will indorse, by refusing to sanction a measure which crushes out the liberty of a portion of our people.

As showing still further that the reports of ostracism and intimidation on the part of democrats are untrue, and as confirming my statements that such intimidation is only with the republican party, I submit one hundred and forty-seven affidavits of colored men, one of which I will read, they all being the same in substance:

STATE OF ALABAMA,
Mobile County:

Personally appeared before me, Alexander W. Roulstein, a notary public in and for said county and State, Sydney Evans, residing at Mobile, Alabama, who being sworn in due form according to law, deposes and says that he was threatened with death and bodily harm by the white and black republicans if he voted the democratic or conservative ticket, and by such threats and intimidation was prevented from voting at the November election, and from exercising the right of suffrage secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

SYDNEY EVANS.

In addition to these one hundred and forty-seven affidavits I had a joint affidavit signed by James L. Cassady and eleven other policemen of Mobile, which I will read:

MOBILE, January 14, 1875.

We, the undersigned, citizens of Mobile, do hereby swear that we were in the employment of the officers of the city of Mobile as policemen, and sundry other employments, during the year 1874, the city then being under the rule of the republican party, C. F. Moulton, mayor; that on the 3d day of November, 1874, we did at the State election vote for the candidates on the conservative ticket, for which offense we were ostracized, and the next day discharged from such service.

JAMES L. CASSADY,
And eleven others.

And yet, with all this testimony, the chairman speaks glibly of ostracism and intimidation by democrats, and the discharge of men for voting the republican ticket. I deny, Mr. Speaker, that a scintilla of evidence has been elicited showing the discharge of colored men for so voting, and assert that the only intimidation and ostracism to-day in Alabama is among the republican party toward white and colored men who would not vote to countenance the fraud, depredation, and crimes committed by that party.

As a further evidence that the republican party is a party of ostracism and intimidation, not only in Alabama but all over the country, I exhibit a ticket prepared in the city of Washington and sent to Mare Island in my own district, known in California as the "tape-worm" ticket, which is three inches in length, one-sixteenth of an inch in width, and with the State, county, and township ticket printed upon it in letters so small that it required a microscope to read them, which the workmen of Mare Island were compelled to carry in their hands to the polls or lose their situations. This ticket was gotten up by the party of progress, and is known as the "tape-worm" ticket, more particularly on account of its size, but at the present time indicates the wriggles and agony of the republican party.

One more affidavit and I am done with Alabama.

The deputy United States marshal, a republican, and a candidate for the State Legislature, testifies as follows:

STATE OF ALABAMA,
County and City of Mobile:

Personally appeared before me, Henry S. Skaats, United States commissioner for the southern district of Alabama, James S. Perrin, who is known to me personally, and after being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says: That he was appointed and commissioned deputy United States marshal for the southern district of Alabama on the 12th day of October, 1874, by Robert W. Healy, United States marshal, and at the request of the republican State executive committee; and on the 27th day of the same month made a requisition on the commander of the military post of Mobile for a detachment of soldiers to enforce writs of the United States courts, but said writs had no existence. This requisition was made at the suggestion of the chairman of the republican State and district executive committees, and with the concurrence of members of said committee.

The real object of these troops was to quarter them in the most central portion of the democratic part of the district, and intimidate democratic voters by causing reports to be circulated that the deponent had warrants for the arrest of a large number of whites for alleged violation of the enforcement act and national election law; also for persons who had failed to pay colored men their full wages. Many persons who had taken an active part in the democratic nominating convention, and some who had had personal difficulties with colored men, were led to believe the report was correct, and rather than be arrested and arraigned before a United States commissioner's court with unscrupulous witnesses to testify against them, and in order to avoid the expense and trouble of a trial, prepared to leave and did leave the county. This action incited and encouraged the more partisan and turbulent negroes to unite the colored row against the whites, and enabled the deponent to vote them as he chose.

There were about three hundred and fifty democratic voters in Monroe County who had been lumbering in the counties of Conecuh, Escambia, and Covington, but had returned on account of the timber panic, and who were prevented from voting by the deputy marshal, who was under the impression at the time that they had forfeited their residences and would be violating the constitution of the State of Alabama, which was construed by the marshal that it required a residence of six months in the State and county before they could legally vote, and any violation of the State laws was a violation of the national election law approved February 28, 1871. The aforesaid persons, being uncertain about their rights in the premises, and not wishing to have any trouble with the national authorities, did not vote in the election held on the 3d day of November, notwithstanding they had resided in the county three months preceding the election.

The affiant further affirms that three and a half hogsheads of Government bacon (more or less) were placed at his disposal, which he issued to the colored people exclusively, with a few exceptions, a small number of whites whose poverty alone excited the sympathy of the deponent. Reports were circulated by some republicans that on a given day the deponent would issue the bacon to colored persons who would vote the republican ticket, and if they received the bacon and afterward neglected to vote as required, they would forfeit all their rights in law, &c. While the deponent did not himself circulate any of the aforesaid reports, he neglected to affirm or deny any of them. After the deponent had issued the bacon he put up the following notice:

"In order to correct the impression that I am using Government bacon to influence the election, no more will be issued until the 3d day of November, 1874.

"J. L. PERRIN."

In conjunction with the above notice, the deponent gave letters to persons authorizing them to list all persons who had been injured by the overflow of the Alabama River or any of its tributaries. These listers would give the needy to understand that it would be expected of them to vote the republican ticket if they got any bacon. Many persons, who expected there would be a large amount of bacon issued after the election, were induced to vote the republican ticket or not vote at all. The deponent caused to be issued in the adjoining counties to Monroe that on the 3d day of November he would give a barbecue at Monroeville, free to all who chose to come.

This caused negroes in large numbers to come, and who voted the republican ticket, (straight.) At least five hundred illegal votes were cast there, and these for Horalson against BROMBERG. Without the influence as cited above, Horalson would not have received more than one hundred votes, as the colored people were getting along so well with the whites in the way of getting cheap rents and supplies to enable them to run their farms; and not wishing to discontinue such relations with their landlords, they would have voted the democratic ticket almost en masse. The deponent took possession of the polls at Monroeville on the day of election, and stationed the soldiers in the following manner: One at the door of the room where the balloting was being done, two at the ingress of the circle, and one at the egress. The deponent was a candidate for the Legislature.

JAMES S. PERRIN.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this the 22d day of December, 1874.

HENRY S. SKAATS,
United States Commissioner Southern District Alabama.

Now, gentlemen of the republican party, these are facts that are sworn to by respectable, honest, and intelligent citizens, men who have lived in the community for years. But in addition to these I add a few more evidences of the crimes of the republican party in Alabama. Let honest republicans read the following letter from Isaac Heyman, the hunter-down of Union men through the mountains, and now one of your office-holders in Alabama, to General R. W. Healy, United States marshal.

ROOMS REPUBLICAN EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
Opelika, Alabama, October 20, 1870.

MY DEAR GENERAL: When you become disgusted with letters from me, telegraph and I'll cease writing; as it is I shall continue. Another county heard from, and a good, clever, "brave-as-a-lion" fellow recommended to the high and exalted office of United States deputy marshal. The euphonious name of the gentleman is W. G. Mayberry, and I hope you'll send his commission and appoint as many more as we (I) may be able to get to serve. The deputies will all vote right in this district. Twenty thousand blank commissions will carry the State overwhelmingly. Bait is good, and especially for democratic office-hunger. Permit me to call your attention to the note printed at the foot of your deputy's commission. I thought they had a right to arrest violators of the Federal election law on the day of election (flagrante delicto) without warrant or other process. The summoning of jurors before election will do much good. Don't send this letter to the Attorney-General. No troops here as yet. Taxing you to answer this, I am yours always,

ISAAC HEYMAN.

Examine also carefully letters from Heyman, Keils, and Maher, in which they recommend proper persons for jurors, and in which they call for blank warrants and commissions, the one to be used for the the same purpose as Perrin had used them, to intimidate white voters, and the other as "bait."

Let me also call your attention to Keils's letter (p. 1274) in which he says "all is quiet, canvass going on, but send us troops."

O, shame! Can it be possible that we have men who are guilty of such atrocious, infamous, and damnable acts! And yet the majority of the committee have failed to see anything but outrages on the part of southern democrats. I will say to that majority, "pluck the beam out of thine own eye," most virtuous legislators!

Knowing these crimes on the part of adventurers, plunderers, and "carpet-baggers," can you expect the people of the South to love them, to associate with such marauders? Is there a people on the face of the earth that would? But, Mr. Speaker, I would not convey the idea that all the republicans of Alabama are of the class I have mentioned. No, sir; General Healy, Ex-Senator Warner, Southworth, Judge Wood, Rice, Smith, Kimball, and hundreds of others are true, honest, gallant men who have settled in Alabama, invested their money, and, acting the part of good citizens, are respected by all and welcomed by the people of the South. It is only your Heymans, your Keils, your Saltieles, and men of that stamp, who do not receive or merit the countenance of honest men.

Leaving Mobile, I now wish to call your attention to Eufaula. At Eufaula a large number of witnesses testified. Hon. H. D. Clayton, judge of the eighth judicial district; Ex-Congressman Shorter, J. M. Macon, and a large number of other witnesses of the highest respectability, irrespective of party, were called by the minority, and testified (p. 837–861) that the riot at Eufaula was incited by colored men. It was shown by testimony taken that the negroes were advised by the notorious Keils to come armed to the polls; and that in accordance therewith some five hundred, preceded by fife and drum, and armed with guns, pistols, clubs, and wagon-spokes, came in the town in one direction, and about eight hundred or one thousand, similarly equipped, entered in another direction. At the request of leading citizens, irrespective of party, some prominent citizens headed by a United States marshal went out and met the negroes and advised them not to come to the polls armed; but, unheeding the advice of men who wanted to prevent bloodshed, they marched into town and took possession of the polls, cursing and yelling. On the attempt of a colored man to vote the democratic ticket he was seized, and when the marshal and democrats endeavored to prevent the killing of the negro they were fired upon, and the fire was returned by the whites and resulted in the killing and wounding of several men on both sides.

I append the testimony of Rev. J. C. Davis, taken at his bedside on account of illness:

Rev. J. C. DAVIS, called for the minority, sworn and examined.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. What is your profession?

Answer. I am an Episcopal minister.

Q. Were you in this city at the November election?

A. I was.

Q. Were you present or did you see the riot take place during the day of the election in this city?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know who fired the first shot?

A. I went down to the election about half past nine o'clock, and, as my custom is, up into the office of Colonel Shorter. There are two windows in the building looking to the east. That gave me a view of the crowd all together, because the crowd was almost immediately under the windows, in one of which I was sitting. At about half past ten I saw a movement in the crowd, and watching it I found that the police, or other parties—deputy sheriffs for the day, and others—had a colored man in their possession. Why he was arrested I did not know at that time; but as they were endeavoring to take him to the guard-house, I saw from fifty up to sixty negroes following after him and the officers, with the view, as I supposed, to get him away from them. Nothing serious occurred on the part of that immediate mob. At about half past twelve I was looking over the crowd, and in a southeasterly direction from me the crowd was swaying to and fro. Between that place and myself there was a well, in the center of the street. The crowd moved on the other side of the well up toward the north and in a diagonal direction toward me. As they came out I saw two men clinch. One was a white man, the other was a negro. The white man's back was toward me. The negro's face was toward me. Seemingly, the white man had hold of the negro with both hands, holding him, and as they got out to the edge of the crowd, I saw the negro stoop slightly, throw himself up and around, and by that movement he broke loose from the white man. He ran about five or seven steps from the white man. I saw him turn around and his arm raised. I saw him shoot and heard the report and saw the smoke. He shot while the white man was falling, because in endeavoring, and in actually breaking away from the white man, he threw the white man forward. The white man did not fall to the ground, but nearly so. While the white man was recovering from the fall the negro shot. Even while the white man was falling, or while he was recovering himself, there was a second shot. Who fired the second shot, I do not not know; it came from the direction of the white man who was falling. Upon the firing of these shots almost simultaneous, the negro fell. I supposed that he had been shot, but I saw him immediately rise, fire again, and run. He fell a second time, but before he fell the second time there were at least from five to seven or ten shots fired. I supposed that he was shot again. I saw nothing more of him during the morning. There were, I suppose, one hundred and seventy-five shots fired that morning all within the space of, perhaps, of fifty or sixty seconds. It may have been slightly over that. It was not more than a minute before the trouble was all over. In the general melee, standing as I did in the window, after the ten or fifteen shots, fearing that a shot might perhaps get up into the window, I retired from it. I saw nothing more of the general shooting until it was nearly over. I looked out again and then saw three persons shoot. One, however, was a colored man, who shot up in the air. He did not seem to be aiming at any one. I saw another negro standing north of the well in the center of the street, shoot toward the southeast, and then toward the southwest, and then he threw himself down upon the ground, folded his hands under him as if he had not done anything at all. I saw a white man standing about ten feet from the negro who fell, and who seemed to see the negro shoot in that way. When this white man saw the negro shoot and fall for protection, I saw him pull out his pistol and aim at him, but he put his pistol back without firing. He was not, I suppose, more than ten feet from the negro who had thus fallen for protection. I saw another negro deliberately take aim at a white man. He shot, but at the time his pistol went off four negroes ran between the negro with the pistol in his hand and the white man. One of these negroes fell, and immediately this white man, being an especial friend of mine, and in my church, I went down to see whether he was killed or injured. As I got down upon the sidewalk there was a colored man at my left. Immediately I had taken my step, the colored man threw up his arm saying, "I am shot." The ball passed not more than two inches from my head. Coming down, I found the white man had escaped, and that the negro had been slightly wounded in the shoulder or arm, and fell as he was shot. That is all the shooting that I saw. In the general melee it would have been impossible for me to point out the shooters.

Q. I understand you to say that you are positive that the first shot fired was fired by a negro?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you know his name?
A. I did not know his name at the time.
Q. Have you learned his name since?
A. I have. He is called Milus Long or Lawrence. It is one and the same person.
Q. Did you know the white man whom he shot at?
A. I did not know the white man at the time, but ascertained afterward from a combination of circumstances the white man was Mr. Charles Goodwin. I inquired who the white man was, and I knew that the negro who fired was the negro who broke loose from the white man.
Q. Was there any firing from the buildings on either side of the street in the upper stories?
A. I saw and heard none; there was none so far as I personally know.
Q. The firing all seemed to be in the street below you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see many negroes armed with clubs or sticks and pistols?
A. Not with pistols, but any number with large clubs and sticks. There was evidently a nervousness among the negroes that morning, and the white people generally seemed to apprehend a good deal of difficulty.
Q. The white people seemed to entertain fear of the negroes?
A. Very decidedly. I do not think that the white men were so thoroughly armed at the beginning of the day as the shooting would indicate. I think that when they found the negroes to be in such a spirit, and actually threatening, they thought it prudent for them to prepare themselves, and I think that the preparation of the white men that day grew out of the threatening attitude of the negroes coming to the polls with clubs and large and heavy sticks, any number of which could be seen that day.
Q. What is your age?
A. I am forty-nine years of age.

I might also refer to the evidence of Miles Colquet and other colored men who agree with the whites, that the negroes fired the first shot, and were the inciters of the riot. In fact the testimony taken at Eufaula, as in other places, showed that the negroes, incited by unprincipled white men, were clearly the instigators, and that no intimidation or ostracism prevailed except on the part of republican negroes toward democrats of the same color.

I now append a card published by the Hon. Samuel Flintroy, colored, for several years a member of the Legislature, a leading republican of Eufaula, and highly respected by all parties, who became so thoroughly disgusted with the action of Kiels and others that he abandoned his party:

[From the Eufaula Times, (tri-weekly,) January 6, 1875.]

A CARD.

To the good people of Barbour County:

For several months past I have been convinced that the radical party, South, and especially in Barbour County, are a corrupt, false, and dishonest set of men, selfishly aiming at personal gain, utterly regardless of the true interest and legitimate destiny of the country. And I have desired so to declare myself in an address or published card, but have been persuaded not to do so. I now solemnly assert and publish, and hereby pledge myself in future accordingly to act, that there ought to be only one party here for the interest of land, labor, and honesty—for their interests and welfare are kindred and indissoluble; and my knowledge of the past and present assures me that our salvation as a people, white and black, is to be all democrats, determined no longer to listen to or follow the evil counsel of bad men, who have no interest in the country beyond their own personal political elevation.

SAM. FLINTROY.

JANUARY 1, 1875.

In Eufaula the bacon was used, as in other places, to control republican votes; but all testimony bearing on the bacon business was ruled out by the majority.

D. McRea, a leading republican, was appointed agent, as will be seen by the following notice:

NOTICE.

EUFAULA, ALABAMA, October 5, 1874.

Notice is hereby given that all persons living upon overflowed lands in the second congressional district of Alabama, who make application for supplies under the late act of Congress, must make the same in writing, setting forth that they are in want, the number and names of persons in family, giving exact location of their residence, having said application approved or certified to by some responsible person who is cognizant of the facts as set forth in the application.

Upon receipt of said application, properly made out and vouched for, supplies will be issued. In case the same is to be shipped, the parties must furnish shipping directions and pay all expenses.

I will commence to receive your applications from October 12 until the day I commence to distribute, on the 4th of November, 1874.

D. McREA, Agent.

It will be seen from the notice that twenty-three days would necessarily elapse before any of the bacon would be distributed to applicants; and the fact that the distribution was to take place the day after the election was conclusive evidence that none but those who voted the republican ticket would receive the bacon.

The testimony (pp. 1292–1299) shows that the republican congressmen met in caucus, without consulting their democratic and liberal republican colleagues, and agreed upon the distribution of bacon.

The testimony of Captain Gentry, United States Army, shows that bacon was sent by Hon. CHARLES HAYS away from the overflowed country into the highlands, distributed and used for political purposes, and that Captain Gentry seized what he could get hold of and sold it by order of his superior officers.

When it was ascertained that the bacon sent to Alabama had been used mainly for political purposes, the majority of the committee with true republican virtue, decided that they were not sent to take such evidence, and ruled it out.

The testimony of Mr. Kimball, a northern man connected with the railroad interests of Alabama, and of Mr. White, a gentleman of culture and a republican of high standing, who was sent by the New York Tribune to examine into the facts and present a truthful statement of affairs, shows that no ostracism or intimidation existed in Alabama except that practiced and adhered to by the republicans.

I call your attention to a portion of the testimony of Ho J non.P. Southworth, a life-long republican and an earnest supporter of that party in Alabama:

JOHN P. SOUTHWORTH, a witness for the minority, sworn and examined.

By Mr. LUTTRELL:

Question. State your name, age, residence, and occupation.
Answer. My name is John P. Southworth; age, forty; residence, Mobile, Alabama; my profession is that of a lawyer.
Q. Have you held the office of United States district attorney for that district?
A. Yes, sir; I have held the office of United States attorney for the southern district of Alabama four years, and also held the office for the northern and middle districts for about two years during that time.
Q. Do you know the condition of affairs in Alabama as to social ostracism on the part of the whites against northern men?
A. So far as my own experience goes, I do; and I think I do as to others.
Q. What is that condition?
A. I have never been ostracized.
Q. Are you a republican?
A. I am, and always was since the organization of the party. I studied my politics on the western reserve in Ohio, where I was a law student, and graduated under Owen Lovejoy, in Illinois. I have been an old-time republican, and what might have been termed in those days a free-soiler.
Q. Do you know whether there is any discrimination as against a black man any more than against a white man made by the courts and juries in the trials of cases in Alabama in which blacks and whites are interested?
A. So far as my experience as a prosecuting officer or as a mere practicing lawyer since my term of office expired in May, 1873, I say no. I do not think there is.
Q. Have you prosecuted and defended criminals in that State and prosecuted and defended civil suits of both colored and white?
A. Yes, sir; I might say that I have prosecuted criminals in that State and defended men charged with crimes.
Q. In your official capacity, have you prosecuted any republicans? And, if so, state the case, and whether he was convicted or not.
A. While district attorney I prosecuted a postmaster of Mobile charged with embezzling the public funds. I say prosecuted. I drew the indictment and went out of office before the trial was had. He was tried by a jury which, I think, were nine-tenths his political opponents; and I know his bail were mainly democrats of the city of Mobile, the bail being fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, and he was acquitted. He was probably as active and zealous a republican as there was in that city. His labors were not confined simply to Mobile; they extended to the Legislatures.
Q. Do you see any necessity for the intervention of the Federal authority in Alabama to preserve peace and order in that State, or do you believe that the people of the State are capable of self-government and the mangement of their own internal affairs? I mean the masses of the people.
A. Yes, sir; I think they are. Do not understand me now that I am in favor of abolishing Federal courts. I am in favor of the Federal courts to enforce any of the laws that Congress has or shall pass.
Q. Do you believe that fair elections can be held in that State without the intervention of Federal authority?
A. I do. I mean by that, just as fair as in Illinois. I do not believe that many elections are what is termed in its true sense fair. I think there is shenanigan on all sides.
Q. You think it is just about as it is in many of the other States of the Union?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do the negroes, as a general thing, vote one ticket?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you believe that if the negroes were let alone and permitted to vote as they might wish, without the interference of politicians on either side, that it would better the condition of the people of that State?
A. Yes, sir; I should think it would. I think that the State would be better off if the negro vote was divided, because I think that lots of whites would come to our party.
Q. Then I understand from that that certain politicians of the republican party who make politics a business rally the negroes as a mass, and by that means the whites are forced as a mass, almost, to oppose them; whereas if the negroes were let alone to pursue their own course and to form their own conclusions they would divide their vote, and by that means the white vote would be divided and a different state of affairs would ensue.
A. Yes, sir; I think that the rule of political economy, that labor will follow the hand that feeds it, would show itself in Alabama were it not for a large amount of political machinery which keeps labor massed on one side.
Q. Do you know who controls the political machinery to keep the labor massed?
A. I think I do.
Q. Please state?
A. I think it is the leading republicans in each county who control that.
Q. Do you mean by that leading republican politicians—men who make it a business to follow politics?
A. Yes, sir; by the term leading republican I mean politician, who lives on politics and nothing else.
Q. Does not a great deal of this political excitement grow out of the massing of the colored vote, creating an excitement on both sides, then excitable men on both sides create riots, whereas the peaceable and well-disposed part of the community take no part in it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. It simply grows out of riots, as you have in any election in any other State in the Union?
A. Yes, sir; that is so.
Q. Are not the white people of Alabama, both democrats and republicans—those who are following a legitimate business and including those republicans who go there with a view to better their condition by engaging in business—are they not kindly disposed toward the negro; do they not desire to see him educated, and to give him all the rights which are guaranteed to him by the Constitution?
A. I think that is so; yes, sir.
Q. From your observation, are not the white democrats of Alabama, the property-holders of that State, anxious to educate the negro and fit him for good citizenship, and to see him employed in business pursuits?
A. Yes, sir; I should say that they are. We occasionally come across some blathering, noisy fellow who does a heap of talking, but he is the exception and not the rule, by any manner of means.
Q. You say that you have been for some years in Alabama, and that you have never been ostracized, but have been treated kindly by all parties?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You are an outspoken and avowed republican?
A. I am, and always have been. I have taken part in every canvass in Alabama, more or less, since I went there in 1868. I do not think there has been a canvass but what I have made one or more speeches. I only made one in the last election; that was at Selma, on my way down from the North, before the election. I have been treated just as kindly in that relation as I ever was in Illinois. I do not think there was a canvass in Illinois for the fifteen years I was there that I did not have a hand in the county where I resided, so far as making speeches was concerned.

Q. Do you anticipate any more trouble in Alabama now, taking into consideration the present state of affairs politically, than you would anticipate in Illinois or any other Western State?

A. I do not.

Q. If the people are let alone, then, do you believe that the State government will be carried on and the peaceful relations existing between the people be just as good there as they are in Illinois or any other State?

A. I do; yes, sir. The change from slavery to freedom of the black men, the poverty that fell upon them by the result of the war, the large debt resting upon the State, the hard times, failure of crops caused by one thing and another, a flood or a drought, as the case may be, all tend to prolong that good time; but, sir, it will come, in my judgment, in the history of that State, as surely as that the State stands as a State.

Q. Do you believe that your opponents, the democratic party of that State, are anxious to bring about these good times in that way by guaranteeing to every man his rights under the Constitution?

A. They say they are, and while the democracy had the State government, under Lindsey, who as an executive was something of a failure in the estimation of everybody, I saw no reason to doubt that. They had it two years. They have it now solidly in most of the principal counties of the State.

Q. Since they have organized the Legislature under the present democratic association, during the last two months, have they passed any act detrimental to the interest of any class of people?

A. No, sir; nor even to the republican party. A great deal was anticipated of redistricting the State, and a new convention, and new constitution; but they have done nothing of that kind, and have been in session two months and more. I do not think they are going to do so, although they may.

Q. To all appearances, have they been laboring for what you believe to be for the best interest and welfare and prosperity of the people of the State?

A. I should think they had. They are trying to cut down salaries and get rid of the officers that are unnecessary and seem to be economizing. I do not know to what extent. I am not in Montgomery. I only watch the morning papers to see what they have done the day before. It is a singular fact that the democratic ticket elected was made up entirely of the anti-secession men of the State, men who were opposed to secession, and fought it until it came on, and then went with their State. That seems to be the spirit in Mobile, for instance. In their city government they have just got possession from the election in December, and seem to have overslaughed all who were known as original secessionists in making up their ticket, and by the taking mainly of young men. There are many young men on that ticket who run that city and county government. All their officers are young men. Their probate, city judge, circuit judge, are all considerably younger than I am. They excluded, or, in other words, they took that class of men who did not labor or could not have labored under any of the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment.

Q. They seemed, then, to take what was known as original anti-secessionists?

A. Yes, sir; whenever they took men of mature years. The present governor, Houston, was known all over the State as a very bitter anti-secessionist.

Q. So that the action of the democrats in that State has been toward amity and good relations with the whole Government?

A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Something was said about the laboring men of that State being kept solid on the republican side by the politicians. Do you say that it is done by trickery, and that it is not the genuine sentiment of the colored people of the State to be on the republican side?

A. No, sir; I do not. I think the natural inclination of the colored men is to the republican party, but I think there would be a breach were it not for the leaders.

Q. What are the tricks or the devices of the republican politicians by which negro men are kept, contrary to their will, in the republican party?

A. I have not examined them all, for I do not know them all; but I think I could answer you better by saying by the same usual artifices that the same class of intelligent voters in the city of New York, with its democratic majority of forty thousand, is kept together. First, by getting them a place here and a place there, and sending them this thing and that thing and the other thing. I have every reason to know that a good many of the workers in a canvass will be rewarded when the term of a court comes in. While I was district attorney fifty witnesses were subpœnaed to come down to Mobile. That would be done for a holiday trip to see the show of New Year's, and they would draw seventy, eighty, or a hundred dollars for mileage, per diem, and one thing and another.

Q. Did you have that done?

A. No, sir; but I could not stop it. Since I went out of office the Attorney-General has established a rule that no witness can be got for the United States except on the written application of the district attorney; but then it was not the rule. A, B, or C could get a subpœna in behalf of the United States for Tom, Dick, and Harry to come down as a witness, and the Government would pay them for their trip.

Q. That abuse has been corrected?

A. Yes, sir; nearly a year ago. That was not one of the tricks, but that was one of the means I was satisfied was used simply to fix the fellow up for the work he might do in his beat. He wanted a trip to Mobile; he wanted to come during the holidays. We have had them down there like locusts; we have had the halls, when the grand jury would be in session in holiday weeks, black with them, and would have to sit with the grand jury until eleven or twelve o'clock at night to get rid of them. They would come in and state what they did not know, not what they did know, for they did not know anything at all about the matters which they pretended. I had that to go through with at least two or three terms.

Q. How many terms did this take place?

A. Three terms.

Q. What years?

A. The winter of 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872.

Q. Did you ever remonstrate against that to anybody?

A. No, sir.

Q. Why did you not?

A. I do not know why I did not. Because there was nobody to remonstate to. I would frequently say, "Where in the name of common sense did these men come from? Who had them come?" But nobody knew? They were regularly subpœnaed, and had their subpœnas with them.

Q. You said there were not a hundred men in Alabama who were not either office-holders or office-seekers who were republicans?

A. I say whom I ever met.

Q. You said you believed they could have a fair election in Alabama without the presence of the Army. Do you mean to say that as applicable to every place in Alabama?

A. Yes, sir. I mean to say that that is my judgment.

Q. Do you think the colored men can, without intimidation or terror, vote freely any ticket they desire in every part of Alabama?

A. I think that they can. I do not say that they can, and do not want you to understand me that way. I do not give it as an opinion of an expert, but I think they can.

I also call your attention to the testimony of Mr. BROMBERG, a liberal republican member, and Mr. CALDWELL, a democratic member from Alabama, both of whom corroborate the testimony of Mr. Southworth.

I will dwell no longer upon the Alabama testimony. It shows conclusively that the riot and bloodshed in that State are not wholly traceable to the democracy, and that the whole scheme of securing Federal interference was gotten up by the leaders of the republican party in manufacturing outrages that did not exist; or where they did exist, it was only in the camps of the republicans. For what purpose this scheme was concocted, is known to every one.

Neither the republican governor nor any State officer had called for troops. The campaign was being conducted in as orderly a manner as campaigns in other States. Political excitement ran high and the prospects were that the republican ticket would be defeated. Mr. HAYS seeing what the result would be, and that his defeat would be accomplished if left to the people of the State, determined upon presenting such a statement as would show to the Administration the necessity for Federal interference. (See testimony of Dew and Abrams.) Without regard to the true facts of the case, with an eye single to the interests of his own party and himself, the letter to General HAWLEY was written, in which the people of Alabama were treated as outlaws, murderers, and guilty of every crime known to humanity. The result was what he asked for. Soldiers were sent to Alabama to carry the State for the republican party.

Why did not the committee call Mr. HAYS? He had preferred his charges; why was he not made to prove them? Simply for the reason that he could not, and simply for the reason that they dared not, knowing that the charges were false and without foundation and that a cross-examination would elicit such falsity. The same page that will hand down the history of the trials, sufferings, and virtues of the gallant sons and daughters of Alabama will also contain the name of CHARLES HAYS; but in what connection? The same page that tells the trials, sufferings, and crucifixion of our blessed Saviour conveys to us also the character of him who betrayed Him.

There are some men who to-day oppose the South and favor its oppression who but a few years ago were the loudest in denouncing every principle emanating from northern people. The only man in the Alabama Legislature who opposed the adoption of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution is to-day a republican member from that State, and one of the most active supporters of the obnoxious bill now before this House.

In a speech delivered in the Alabama Legislature on the 20th day of September, 1865, in which he evinced the most bitter antagonism to adopting the amendments which gave the right of suffrage to the black race, Hon. ALEXANDER WHITE said:

> The great democratic party is marshaling its hosts for the approaching presidential contest. Democratic victories come to us whenever we hear of a contest in which political issues are presented to the people.
> The South needs no eulogy, and when I raise my voice or lift my hand against her may the live thunder rive me where I stand. Though I be false in all else, I will be true to her. Though all others prove faithless, I will be faithful still.

These are the past and prophetic utterances of the gentleman from Alabama as late as 1868; the first to urge a white man's government; the first to advocate a war of races; the only man to oppose a ratification of an amendment which gave the rights of citizenship and suffrage to four million colored people. If these people err to-day, such men as those I have mentioned were the first to sow the seeds of discord and dissension; the first to lead their party, and forgetting the principles they have advocated, seek now to oppress their friends, neighbors, and kinsmen by a measure which takes from the people their liberty and makes them the creatures of an administration bent on accomplishing its own purposes at the expense of a nation's ruin.

Before closing my remarks on Alabama affairs, I have a few words to say of a man who, claiming to be a Christian, and a member of the Methodist Church, needs a passing notice. I allude to "J. G. Hester," a spy, an informer, and a tool of the Attorney-General, "who invokes God's blessing on everything he does, night and morning." Disguised as a tobacco and brandy peddler he went through the State of Alabama deceiving the people, and inciting the whites and blacks to riot in order to make a case for the Government and secure Federal interference in order to carry the State for the republican party.

I append a few extracts from his testimony as showing the character of this professed Christian. On a cross-examination by Mr. BUCKNER, relative to the manner of obtaining testimony, the following was testified to by Hester:

Q. Did you talk to the merchants here about the Ku-Klux, and all that sort of thing?

A. Yes, sir; I carried plugs of tobacco in both pockets, so that they could see I was a peddler. My main object was to talk with them, to get acquainted with them, and find out what they were up to. I did not care whether I sold any tobacco or not.

Q. You spoke to them, saying how you had carried the election in North Carolina by killing negroes?

A. Yes, sir; politics seemed to be the only topic there at the time.

Q. Your object was to deceive them?

A. Yes; for a time.

Q. You told them lies for the express purpose of getting into their confidence, did you not?

A. I told them what I conceive to be deceptions. You can call them lies if you choose. I did not mean them as lies; I meant them for good. Afterward told them, "Now, gentlemen, I take all the deception back. I only did it for the good of the country, of the people, and of your community."

Q. You did evil that good might come?

A. I do not consider that that was evil. I am a member of the Methodist Church.

I do not want to do anything wrong. I try to do right. I invoke God's blessing on everything I do, night and morning.

Q. And yet you lied to them?

A. I lied, if you like to call it a lie.

Q. Do you call it a lie?

A. I do not. It is not such a lie as one would tell to the injury of an innocent person.

Q. You think you were telling the truth, then, when you were telling this?

A. Yes, sir; I think it was the truth in the eyes of God.

Q. Not truth in fact, but truth in the eyes of God?

A. I believe it was truth in the eyes of God, for the purpose of finding out who these murderers were; and I used deception and used the same weapons of deceit they used in order to find out their evil deeds.

Q. You profess to be telling the truth now, do you?

A. I do.

Q. What guarantee or assurance can you give us that you are telling the truth now more than you gave to those people?

A. I feel the higher obligation, now, sir.

Q. In what does that obligation consist?

A. That obligation consists now in the oath I have taken here to tell the truth; that it may go out to the people, that the people may be convinced of crime, murder, and all sorts of outrages being committed in Alabama.

Q. Is the obligation to tell the truth any greater now than it was to tell the truth at all times?

A. Yes, sir; the very highest obligation that could rest upon a man rests upon me now to tell the truth.

Q. Then it did not?

A. Yes, sir; the obligation that I had then was to my Government, to find out the the truth; and in order to do so I had to deceive those people.

Q. By falsehood and deception?

A. By deception.

Q. By falsehood and lies?

A. If you choose to call it lies, I have no objection.

Q. You mean to say, then, that if it was necessary to subserve the ends of Government, you would commit murder, would you not?

A. No, sir.

Q. Why not?

A. Then I would be injuring somebody; but I would not be injuring any one in trying to catch criminals who are murdering the people there. If I went there and told them I was a Government agent, and that I had come to find out who had killed Ivey, I could not have found out anything at all.

Q. You believe that a large majority of those who have negroes employed upon their plantations, and who must look to the negro to cultivate the soil, believe in murdering these negroes?

A. I do not believe they want to murder the negro if the negro will do as they want him to do, and vote their ticket. That seems to be the only conflict.

Q. You were traveling around there as a spy or detective of the Government, or a Government agent—call it what you please—practicing deception and worming yourself in to ascertain the private sentiments of the citizens. Did you at any time advise them to drive these negroes away and to kill them?

A. I encouraged them in their way of talking.

Q. You encouraged them in their evil ways?

A. I encouraged them in their way of talking in order to get at their true sentiments, and to find out which particular individuals were doing these things.

Q. When you were going about doing this thing did you see any particular democrats in either of those counties beating and abusing negroes or driving them away from their premises?

A. I stated in my direct examination that I saw this large armed body of men at Belmont, and they told me they were hunting negroes. I saw them flourishing their guns, some were galloping, and they were hurrahing, "We'll get the damned niggers yet."

Q. Were you in company with white democrats and negroes at the same time?

A. Only at Belmont. They had six negroes there in a carriage-house held as prisoners.

Q. For resisting the sheriff?

A. No, sir.

Q. For what?

A. They did not say. They said they were some whom they had picked up down in the woods. I saw the negroes afterward. They said they were arrested, and compelled before they were released to make an oath, which they knew was false, with guns pointed at their heads. They were compelled to swear that they were hiding in the woods to keep away from Bob Reed, and that Bob Reed wanted to conscript them into his army to fight the whites. They said that that oath was totally false, and that they took it through fear that they would be killed if they didn't do so.

Q. Did you see any of those planters or did you hear of any of those planters beating or maiming negroes or driving them away from their plantations?

A. I did not see them doing it, but I saw the negroes with bruises on them and with the blood running out of their bodies.

Q. And you were going on and encouraging this thing all that time with a view to gain the facts?

A. Yes, sir; but if any one had come to me and said "We are going to kill a negro to-night," that negro would not have been killed.

Q. Still you were encouraging them to do this thing?

A. I did not particularly encourage them to kill negroes. I said "We have carried the election that way," and they said "We are going to carry it that way too."

Q. That was your idea of a Christian spirit?

A. Anything to find out a deep-seated crime against the citizens of the Government.

Q. Did you practice that when you became a captain of a blockade-runner, and also an officer of a rebel cruiser?

A. When I joined the confederate navy I joined it as honestly as I joined the service of the North. I found out my mistake after I had been in the confederate service.

Such is the testimony of a man who admits he prompted the people to do wrong in order to make them do right; that he both lied to and deceived them and urged them to commit crime. This is the testimony of a man professing to be a Christian. There is a place where good Christians never go, full of such men as Hester.

Sir, there is one other witness I should mention, Galtiel, who swears that he was the correspondent of the New York Times. A gentleman near me asks who he is. He was a man who went to Alabama from the State of Missouri, obtaining money under false pretenses, as I have letters here to show. His face would "decorate any rogue's gallery," and his own testimony shows that he lived and associated with the lowest in the land. I will be charitable enough to say that the paper which published his false telegrams and dispatches had never seen its correspondent; for if it had it would never have published them.

The gentleman from Alabama intimated last night that one of the members of the minority of the committee had been in the rebel army. If the gentlemen referred to me, let me tell him that I was not in the rebel army; that at the time referred to I was a member of the Legislature of my State, and that I voted for every dollar that was asked in my State to pay the soldier for services rendered in the maintenance of the Union; that I voted for the ratification of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments which struck the shackles from four million slaves, and I am proud of that vote. I believe in educating the negro and making him a good citizen; and as long as I can raise my voice or exert any influence, my efforts shall be directed to their elevation, but not at the degradation of the white men.

It may be admissible for me to ask where was the gentleman from Alabama when I was maintaining the cause of the Government and the integrity of the nation? I answer, sir, that he was trying to trample under foot and destroy the best government on the face of God's earth.

I am a democrat, and I am proud of it. To be a democrat is to stand by the Union and the Constitution, to protect all alike, to grind no man or set of men to the dust. That is democracy, and those are the principles under which this Government will be administered under the rule of the democratic party. To the people of Alabama and of the entire South I would say be firm, forbearing, and forgiving. The night of your agony will soon pass away, and the day will bring with it gladness. The people of the North have heard your lamentations. The cry has been taken up all over the land, and millions of hearts sympathize with you. Be just and patient. Cultivate a kindly feeling among you and for your conquerors; bury all animosities, and in time the dark cloud will lift and the glorious sunlight of prosperity and happiness will dawn upon the entire people of the South.

With a few remarks on the condition of affairs in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas I will close.

LOUISIANA.

From the report on the condition of affairs in the late insurrectionary States I quote the following as showing the debts and liabilities of the State of Louisiana:

Debts and liabilities.

In 1861	$10,099,074 34
In 1868	14,347,051 62
In 1871	41,194,473 91
Excess of expenditures over receipts 1871	9,345,733 00

Percentage of increase, 1868 to 1871, 200.

Tax levy.

In 1860	4,960,780 60
In 1870	6,490,028 00

Percentage of increase in ten years, 50.

Property valuation.

In 1860	435,787,265 00
In 1870	251,296,017 02

Percentage of decrease in ten years, 50.

In connection with the general condition of the South, I quote from the same report:

It will thus be seen that while the assessed valuable of the taxable property in the eleven States of the South has been reduced from $4,333,757,942 in 1860 to $2,026,440,971 in 1870, being a loss of $2,307,306,971, or over $300,000,000 more than now remains, the State taxation on what those people now have was in 1870 $12,813,615, while it was $8,165,486 in 1860, when their affairs were managed by their own people; and the county taxation in 1860, on all the property they then owned, was only $3,115,184, while now, under carpet-bag and negro rule, it is $14,298,630, or $11,183,446 more on the remnant still in existence than it was on the whole property when the war began.

In view of the enormous debt which has been wantonly, corruptly, and fraudulently heaped upon a people as poor as the last census report shows the people of the South to be, with five-eighths of their property gone and the taxation on the remnant nearly fourfold as much as it was on the whole when their affairs were honestly managed, is it to be expected that these States will have either love or respect for the men or the party by whom they have thus been plundered?

I appeal to my republican friends of this House to ponder well before you heap further oppression upon these people, as proposed by the iniquitous bill now under consideration.

The people of the South, in many cases, are without the necessaries of life. Squalid poverty and want greet you on every side. Oppressed by taxation, despoiled by political adventurers, and feeling that no relief is at hand, will you still continue their misery and destitution, by passing a measure which adds to their oppression and degrades them in the eyes of the civilized world?

I appeal to my friends from the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, whose people struck the first blow against oppression and for civil liberty, to apply the golden rule, and "do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

I appeal to all the Representatives of the States of the North, the East, and the West to abstain from further oppressive acts which grind out the liberty, the manliness, and the energies of the South. Her condition is to-day without parallel in the world's history.

Let us take pattern from the Romans, who, though grasping for dominion, never degraded those whom they conquered, but on the other hand sought to elevate them so that they might in time become good citizens.

We complain of the wrongs of Ireland, suffering under British rule, with British spies and informers scouring the country, hunting down Irish citizens and thrusting them into dungeons on mere suspicion and imaginary offenses. We point to downtrodden Poland. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we have a people suffering greater wrongs within our own borders. We have spies and informers, we have Hester and

Beach and hundreds of others sent by the Attorney-General, urging people to commit offenses, inflaming the people of the South against the Administration, entering houses, seizing respectable citizens without regard to age, marching them off hundreds of miles to be tried on imaginary offenses, and after being kept in prison for weeks without trial, cuffed, beaten, and in every way insulted, turned loose like dogs, without even knowing for what they were arrested.

These are the men who create your outrages which regale the northern mind through the columns of the radical press.

And for what purpose is this done? Simply that riot and bloodshed having been incited by these spies and informers, the Administration may have some excuse for Federal interference.

Contrast the language of the dispatch of Major-General Winfield S. Hancock in 1867 with that of Lieutenant-General Sheridan in 1875 on the condition of the South:

SHERIDAN—HANCOCK.

Lieutenant-General Sheridan to the Secretary of War, dated Headquarters Military Division Missouri, New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875:

I think the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a law declaring them banditti, they could be tried by military commission. This banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi should, in justice to law and order, and peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti, no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

Major-General Winfield S. Hancock's General Order No. 40, on assuming command of the Fifth Military District, dated New Orleans, Louisiana, November 20, 1867:

The general commanding is gratified to learn that peace and quiet reign in this department. It will be his purpose to preserve this order of things. As a means to this great end, he regards the maintenance of the civil authorities in the faithful execution of the laws as the most efficient under existing circumstances.

In war it is indispensable to repel force by force, and overthrow and destroy opposition to lawful authority. But when insurrectionary force has been overthrown and peace established, and the civil authorities are ready and willing to perform their duties, the military power should cease to lead, and the civil administration resume its natural and rightful dominion. Solemnly impressed with these views, the general announces that the great principles of American liberty are still the lawful inheritance of this people, and ever should be. The right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech, the natural rights of persons, and the rights of property must be preserved.

The one gratified to learn that peace and quiet reign in Louisiana, the other declaring the people "banditti" and advocating a trial by military commission. The one using military force subservient to the civil authorities, the other subserving the civil power and laws of the State to the military.

In addition to these dispatches, I call your attention to the able statement and report of Colonel Morrow, and indorsed by the gallant General Sherman.

I also call your attention to the report of the proceedings of eminent clergymen of Louisiana denying the statements of General Sheridan, and to the people not only of Louisiana, but northern Union men and soldiers, who class his dispatch as infamous.

I also call your attention to the report of the committee of this House, composed of Messrs. PHELPS and FOSTER, republicans, and POTTER, democrat, in which they unite in giving the libel to the report of General Sheridan, and confirm the statements of the white citizens of Louisiana.

To General Sheridan's gallant actions during the war I accord all praise, and gladly would I erase from my memory the act which has stigmatized and disgraced him in the eyes of the civilized world. Backed by Casey, Kellogg, and other men whose names are infamous in the history of Louisiana politics, he directed his soldiers to enter the legislative halls of that State and displace men who were lawfully elected. What is there to prevent the military authority from entering this legislative body and displacing you, Mr. Speaker, or any other member of this House? Nothing whatever.

The policy of the country has been changed. War, with its desolation, rapine, and plunder has hardened the hearts of the conquerors. In former times spies were not a part of our Government. Every man's house was sacred. The Government was composed of statesmen, who studied the wants of the people, and sought not to adopt measures which degraded them. The Army was the instrument in the hands of the people; now the people are the instruments in the hands of the Army. In former times the Army obeyed the commands of its superior officers; now it is commanded by United States marshals. Formerly it was subordinate to the civil power; now "every branch of civil business is subject to the direction and supervision of military laws and military men."

To-day Louisiana is without a republican form of government, and under the tyranny of a usurper, whose name is a synonym of all that is reeking with corruption and crime. "Ignoble villain, fatiguing public indignation, buoyant solely with corruption, he only rises as he rots."

Can we expect good government under such a tyrannical usurper or such a condition of affairs as I have stated? I opine not. The great reform that is sweeping from ocean to ocean brings with it the only remedy. The people are the doctors. They have risen from the hills and the valleys, from the home of the rich and the lowly, from the counter and the workshop, from the factory and the field, and have proclaimed in thunder tones that the war of oppression must cease; that the men who have gone back upon their record must stand aside, and that the North, the South, the East, and the West must be one united country, one people, and one government.

As a further evidence of the fact that the southern people are willing to abide by the laws, I call your attention to the fact that in 1865 President Johnson sent General Grant on a tour of inspection through the Southern States. On the 18th day of December, 1865, General Grant submitted his report, in which he used the following language:

I am satisfied that the mass of thinking men of the South accept the present condition of affairs in good faith. My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the Southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government not humiliating to them as citizens, and that if such a course were pointed out they would pursue it in good faith.

These were his conclusions in 1865, after making a thorough tour of the South. These were his conclusions as a gallant soldier and honest man, without partisan influence or prejudice. He was not then deceived or advised by the fourth-rate pettifogger who now occupies what should be the most exalted and dignified position in the land, that of Attorney-General, nor by those whose sole object is to degrade, abuse, and destroy the southern people.

In common with all American citizens I honor General Grant as a brave and gallant soldier, nor would I pluck one laurel from his brow for the service he has rendered; but in his subsequent career as President he seems to have lost that love for one portion of his people which a wise, generous, and prudent ruler should entertain.

Surrounded by men whose sole object is self-aggrandizement, he has listened to their counsels and not heeded the wail of despair that has risen in one mighty throe from the southern people. I appeal to him as President of this great country to heed it now; to listen ere it becomes too late; to study the wants of the southern people; to abstain from his Long Branch pilgrimage and during the coming spring and summer to visit the South, consult with and advise her people, and satisfy himself outside of all party advisers that the people of that section are willing and earnest to restore prosperity and happiness and live once more under the old flag.

I appeal to him in the name of the South, for the sake of her desolated homes, for the sake of her destitute people, for the sake of the Union which he fought to keep together, that he may without pomp or ceremony visit these people and thoroughly examine the condition of affairs now existing, noting on the one hand the general destitution of the whites and blacks in Alabama, South Carolina, Louisiana, and other States under carpet-bag rule, and on the other hand the flourishing, prosperous, and happy condition of Texas, North Carolina, Missouri, Georgia, the Virginias, and other States controlled by their own State governments and home rule.

Let him examine the State of Alabama, with a climate unsurpassed by none in the Union, a soil teeming with richness, with immense water-power, mineral resources, and all that tends to wealth and prosperity, and ask the reason for her destitution.

Then let him turn to Georgia, with no better advantages than her sister State, and ask the reason for her prosperity. The answer is, home rule; the State governed by people conversant with its wants, by people who seek to elevate, not to degrade; a people who, having seen the ill effects of bad government, have determined to destroy all that tends to evil, and substitute all that tends to wealth and prosperity.

Then let him look to South Carolina, and ask the reason of her destitution. Turn then to North Carolina and see her teeming with prosperity, while South Carolina lies prostrate. Let him look to Louisiana, with her every industry paralyzed, and ask the reason for her degradation. Turn then to Texas, with her wealth and industries, with a State debt almost liquidated, with her people rich and prosperous, and ask wherein lies this prosperity. Home rule, and the States governed by their own intelligence, will be the answer.

I will not, as others have done, appeal to the prejudices of the North, but rather to the intelligence and kindly feelings of all good citizens. Let those who doubt that prosperity comes with self-government, not with Federal bayonets, institute visiting committees composed of representatives of the mercantile, mechanical, and agricultural interests to visit the South and ascertain wherein lies the disease. Unbiased by prejudice, with a determination to learn the truth, such committees would return to the North convinced that the southern people were in earnest in the work of reconstruction, and that they only ask what is accorded to the States of the North, that they may be governed by the intelligence of the people and not by men whose sole object is to despoil and degrade them.

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, as the leader of this House and as one who has the interests of his country at heart, and to my honored friends Mr. KELLEY and Mr. HAWLEY—three of the great representatives of the people—that you visit the South and learn the true condition of affairs, and having satisfied yourselves of the wrongs under which she suffers, that, unbiased by partisanship, you inform the people of the North that the republican party has wronged a just, brave, and generous people, who are struggling under adverse circumstances to regain a foot-hold in the sisterhood of States. Give to the South a republican form of government as guaranteed by the Constitution, and wealth takes the place of poverty, industry of idleness, virtue of vice. Once more the southern ports will be crowded with the cotton-boats, and the mill and the loom send forth their cheering sound. Once more the Union will be cemented in solid bands, and the men of the North and the men of the South will rekindle the old friendships and bury forever the animosities and hatreds of the war, which but for bad government would long since have been forgotten.

Turning now from Louisiana, I ask your attention to affairs in another State, now under carpet-bag rule.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

From the proceedings of the tax-payers' association of South Carolina I cite the following facts, as showing the indebtedness and expenditures under carpet-bag rule:

Property valuation.

In 1860	$490,000,000
1870	170,000,000

A decline in thirteen years of 67 per cent.

Tax levy.

In 1860	$500,000
1873	2,700,000

An increase in thirteen years of nearly 500 per cent.

Legislative expenses.

In 1860	$40,000
1873	291,000

An increase in thirteen years of nearly 700 per cent. The public printing for sixty years aggregated $400,000, or an annual average of $6,666.

Now mark the difference under republican rule, as shown by the following table:

Public Printing.

October, 1870, to October, 1871	$134,151 44
October, 1871, to October, 1872	215,129 86
October, 1872, to October, 1873	331,945 66
Undrawn appropriation	118,054 34
Extra session 1874	125,000 00
Total for three years	924,281 30

or an annual average of $308,093.76. In other words, the expense of public printing for three years under the reconstruction acts was $500,000 more than the expense for sixty years under the administration of the citizens of South Carolina before the war.

I need only add, in further evidence of the vandalism and peculation which governs that State, that under the rule of her own citizens from September, 1868, to October 31, 1870, the cost of public printing was but $43,400, or about $21,000 per year.

From October 31, 1872, to November 19, 1873, the date of the act authorizing the issue of certificates to the Republican Printing Company, certificates of indebtedness receivable for taxes were actually paid for public printing to the enormous sum of $575,000, while the total revenues of the State for the same period, according to the State treasurer's report, were but $1,719,728.

Before the war the annual legislative expenses were but $40,000. Now they amount to $300,000, or more than 700 per cent.

The annual stationery bill of the Legislature before the war was but $400; now it amounts to $16,000, over 4,000 per cent. And yet, according to the republican theory, South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, and the other Southern States now under carpet-bag government, are the best governed States in the South; but, thank God, that theory has been dispelled by facts so palpable that even the worst partisan must acknowledge the ruin which the republican party has inflicted upon the South.

Turning to the report of the Joint Committee on the Condition of the South, Forty-second Congress, (Congressional Globe, volume 2, page 1239,) I find that while the people of South Carolina are struggling for bread, the rate of taxation has been increased under the new constitution twenty times greater than before the war, and this in spite of the fact that property has decreased in value nearly 100 per cent. and that large tracts of land were sold by the sheriff for less than the amount of taxes resting thereupon.

To show the amount of taxes paid by those who, under carpet-bag rule, originated and carried out the scheme of oppressive taxation, I cite the following:

The State government consisted of seven whites and one colored man, the latter having the paid office of least profit.

The amount of taxes paid by these distinguished gentlemen is not only interesting, but instructive. For instance:

The governor pays	None.
The Secretary of State pays	None.
The comptroller-general pays	None.
The treasurer pays	None.
The attorney-general pays	None.
The superintendent of education pays	None.
The lieutenant-governor pays	$15 99
The adjutant and inspector general pays	1 00
Total	16 99
Thus the 8 members of the State corps pay of taxes on an average	$2 11

Of the State Legislature, composed of 57 whites and 98 colored—

Ninety-eight colored men pay	$143 74
One colored man paying	84 65
Hence 97 colored men pay	60 09
Or less than 70 cents each.
Fifty-seven white men pay	$491 49
Eleven conservative white men pay	194 43
Hence 46 whites pay	297 06
Or less than $7 each.

Of these 47 whites 24 pay no taxes, and of the 98 colored 67 pay no taxes; while of the entire Legislature 85 members' names are not to be found upon the tax-book.

Is not this a sad commentary on our boasted form of government. A Legislature composed of men who do not represent a single interest of the State, who create taxes but pay none. The war ceased ten years ago, but oppression did not. To-day the lands of the South are uncultivated, the houses tumbling, the homesteads deserted. The South appeals to you to cease this vandalism, to lift from the hearts of its people the great burden which is placed upon them; and the people of the North and the West have risen and demanded that you shall cease. The handwriting is upon the wall, and yet you heed it not.

In spite of entreaty, in spite of demand, oppression is still the watch-word of the Administration. Power has blinded the vision, corruption has hardened the heart. "Woe unto the world because of offenses! for it must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh!"

One more comparison, and I am done with the affairs of South Carolina. By referring to the Congressional Globe, second session Forty-second Congress, page 435, I find the cost of maintaining certain State governments, and to which I especially call the attention of members of this House, as showing the vandalism and peculation which I have before referred to:

Statement showing the amount appropriated for executive officers, printing, advertising, and contingencies by the following States during the year 1871, and by the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872; also population and number of square miles in each.

States.	Population last census.	Square miles.	Salaries of executive officers.	Printing and advertising.	Contingencies.	Total.
New York	$4,387,464	47,000	$139,550	$175,000	$19,200	$323,750
Maine	626,915	31,760	65,133	35,000	17,400	117,533
New Hampshire	318,300	9,280	12,341	9,830	2,099	24,270
Massachusetts	1,457,351	7,800	234,205	98,531	30,300	363,036
Rhode Island	217,353	1,300	16,908	3,500	Included.	20,408
Connecticut	537,454	4,670	59,800	98,875	....do....	156,675
New Jersey	906,096	8,320	46,187	82,625	7,656	136,468
Ohio	2,665,260	39,960	73,275	75,300	13,250	183,925
Wisconsin	1,064,985	53,920	65,963	54,569	17,008	137,540
Iowa	1,192,092	55,040	41,205	49,495	22,433	113,133
Illinois	2,539,891	55,410	26,753	50,000	39,108	115,861
District of Columbia	131,700	60	449,220	143,635	200,000	792,855

Now, taking the legislative expenses of South Carolina for 1873 at $291,000, and public printing at $331,945.66, the two items make $622,945.66, or nearly 100 per cent. more than the entire cost of the State government of New York; while taking the cost of public printing alone for three years in the State of South Carolina, the sum total, $924,281.30, exceeds the annual cost of the entire State government of the three great States of New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio by $117,533.

The nearest approach to a like expenditure, and for the same purpose, is in the District of Columbia under the board of public works, whose acts in many respects resembled those of the South Carolina Legislature.

MISSISSIPPI.

Now, turning from General Sheridan's action in Louisiana, let us follow the military to Vicksburgh, where but a few days since they entered the court-house and displaced the sheriff and seated the contestant, without any other formality than that of the bayonet, even denying to the courts of the land, who have constitutional authority, the power to determine the rights of the contestants in such cases.

Discarding all law and precedent, may we not soon expect the military power to enter our courts of justice and displace our judges? God forbid that I as an American citizen may ever witness the day when the judiciary of our land is made but a creature of the military power and our courts are controlled as our Legislatures, by the bayonets of United States soldiers.

Turn now to Arkansas, at present blessed with a constitutional form of government, and the evils of a bad administration cured by the people. An election was held, and Brooks no doubt legally elected governor. But the President decided in May, 1874, that under the State constitution the Legislature had the sole authority to determine contested elections, and that as it had decided in favor of Baxter, he was the lawful governor; and with the aid of Federal bayonets Mr. Baxter was maintained in power.

The same Legislature that decided on the legality of Mr. Baxter's election passed an act providing for a constitutional convention, which met and drew up a constitution which was adopted by the people by 75,000 majority. The committee appointed by this House, with but one dissenting vote, declared the constitution had been lawfully adopted. Yet, the President, at the bidding of McClure and other carpet-baggers, has issued a proclamation or message to the Senate, in which he doubts the legality of the constitution adopted, denouncing it as a "revolutionary proceeding," and asking Congress to forcibly interfere and displace Governor Garland and place the State government in the hands of the military power.

The President, in other words, disregards and sets aside his decision of May, 1874, in order to satisfy the greed and ambition of a class of men who have devastated and laid waste the energies of the southern people. And yet, sir, the Administration organs have assumed to read each and every republican who raises his voice against these unholy and unlawful acts of the President out of the party, stigmatizing them as traitors and Judas Iscariots.

Messrs. PHELPS and FOSTER, of this House, who were solemnly sworn to perform their duty as Representatives of the people, and who are known over the nation as two of the most promising and talented young men of the republican party, have been stigmatized as traitors simply because they would not lie.

The great and eminent jurist Mr. Evarts has been read out of the republican party because he would not give his adhesion to the interference of Federal bayonets in seating and unseating State Legislators.

Thousands of eminent republicans—statesmen, lawyers, merchants, judges, and men of all professions and callings—are to-day outside of the republican party because they will not sacrifice their honor and their principles to support an Administration whose efforts are directed to crush out and destroy the liberties of the people.

The great press of the nation—the Tribune, the Times, the Nation, the Sun, the Springfield Republican, the Sacramento Union, the San Francisco Bulletin, the Atlantic Monthly, and hundreds of others, whose influence extends from ocean to ocean—have been read out of the republican party because they will not sanction the acts of the Administration.

But who assumes the power to read the people and the press out of the republican party? The Administration journals who are feasting and fattening upon the patronage of the Government, many of them controlled and owned by men whose political affiliations are with the party that bids the highest price.

But, sir, the people will ere long rise up in their majesty, and, completing the work they inaugurated at the last election, hurl from their heights the men who under the guise of republicanism, have blasted and stigmatized the fair name of our nation. It will not simply be an uprising of the democratic party, but of the people of all parties, who will never be enslaved by a military power, nor recognize its supremacy over the civil and judicial power of the Government.

As republicans, as citizens, as men having the interests of your country at heart, I ask you to ponder well before you take a step which degrades a conquered people and forces upon them a measure which deprives them of all that is dear to an American citizen.

Forget not the great boon signed by John, by the grace of God, at Runnymeade, on the 18th day of June, 1215, and which has been handed down to us through the ages:

> No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized, or outlawed, or banished, or any ways destroyed; nor will we pass upon him, nor will we send upon him, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

Remember, ere you endeavor to carry this measure through the House, that these people are of our own flesh and blood, sprung from the same race, bound together by the same ties, and living together under the same flag, and worshiping the same God.

Is there no sympathy in your hearts, no tear of pity for men who have sinned but suffered; of women and little ones who, crushed by oppression, homeless, and hungry, ask you to spare them the further iniquity which this bill proposes to heap upon them.

It is written that when the almighty God designed and created man, the angels came in their order before Him and spoke of His purpose.

Truth said, create him not, Father; he will deny the right, deny his obligations to Thee, and the sacred, inviolate truth. O, Father, create him not.

Justice said, create him not, Father; he will fill the world with injustice and wrong; he will desecrate Thy holy temple, do deeds of violence and blood, and in the very first generation he will wantonly slay his brother: Therefore, Father, create him not.

But gentle, loving Mercy knelt by the throne and whispered, O, Father! create Thou man. In all his wanderings I will be with him. In his erring and wayward steps I will follow him, and from his own errors I will teach him the lessons of experience and win him back to Thee.

The great and loving God listened to the voice of Mercy, and created man.

Learn, learn, O man! mercy, if thou wouldst win him back to thee and thy country.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I had hoped to have been able to protest at some length against this, in my judgment, most infamous measure. But such is the condition of my health and lungs that I find I must refrain from doing so. I regret this beyond measure. I would that I were able to press home the inquiry to the most thoughtful and statesmanlike men upon the other side of the House, as they draw back tremblingly as though standing upon the brink of an abyss, why it is that this measure—this war measure—is at the present time, in time of profound peace, urged upon the country? I would like to know why you, Mr. Speaker, with the convictions which you are known to entertain, hold your peace on this occasion and in this hour so full of danger—why you refrain from declaring those convictions and placing yourself on the record for your country and the great principles upon which it is founded? Why is it that the statesmen on the other side of this Chamber, the men who can rise above the dictation of mere party, do not come to the rescue—those who are unwilling that the habeas corpus shall be suspended and lost in our system in the interest of party only—who feel the danger of placing the power to suspend this great writ of liberty in the hands of one man, however pure, good, great, or patriotic that man may be?

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen cannot escape the responsibility, those at least whose convictions admonish and warn them. It is to you and your manly courage the country now looks for salvation. The minority cannot prevent the passage of this bill, they cannot save habeas corpus to the Republic without the aid of the patriotic men of the other side.

But I must yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I represent in part the State in which some of the occurrences took place that have furnished the occasion for this proposed legislation. An investigating committee has been sent to that State and its report has not been submitted to this House until to-day, and I fear that in the closing scenes of this session I shall have no opportunity to discuss and refute the statements of that report. Sir, as the only member from Mississippi chosen by that portion of the people to be affected by this legislation, I respectfully ask the attention of this House to what I have to say in their vindication.

Mr. Speaker, there does exist in some of the Southern States a disquietude in political affairs which has led to outbreaks of a bloody character, which are unusual in the Northern States and in all the other Southern States, and ought to be unknown in the workings of American institutions. I propose to show that these occurrences do not, as has been charged, arise from any purpose to obtain political supremacy in any State, to any antagonism of race, to any lurking discontent with the amendments to the Constitution, or to any hostility to the Union. I propose to show the precise cause of these disturbances and the remedy for them.

Mr. ORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question at that point?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. ORTH. I understand, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi states that the position of his friends in the South is not one of antagonism on account of race or opposition to the legislation of Congress or to the legislation of Congress under the constitutional amendments.

Mr. LAMAR. I mean to say that the position of the native white population of Mississippi is not one of antagonism on account of race nor of opposition to the new constitutional amendments, nor of resistance to the legislation of Congress under those amendments, and my purpose is to show that whatever of disturbance has existed in that State is owing to entirely different causes.

Mr. ORTH. I hold in my hand a copy of what is known as the vagrant law of his own State of Mississippi, placed upon the statute-book by a Legislature which was pre-eminently democratic—not elected by a single colored voter, for then no colored man had the right to vote. Those laws, in my judgment, were calculated to produce a condition of involuntary servitude more severe than slavery itself. If the gentleman will permit I will ask the Clerk to read those laws, and then I would like in all kindness to have the gentleman's opinion in regard to that legislation. I hope, Mr. Speaker, the House will not regard this as coming out of his time.

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir; but it will take many minutes to read those laws, and I should have a corresponding time to answer the gentleman's inquiry. I promise to make a perfectly candid statement with regard to those statutes if time will be given me to do so.

Mr. ORTH. I am myself not able to comply with the gentleman's request, but I hope there will be no objection in this House.

Several MEMBERS, (on the democratic side.) Do not allow it to be read; it will consume your time.

Mr. LAMAR. Yes; let us have the whole truth from beginning to end. The gentleman has interrupted me in the outset of my remarks, to which I do not object, as I have the highest respect for the gentleman from Indiana; but I ought to have time to respond.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I hope, Mr. Speaker, the House will grant the gentleman from Mississippi fifteen minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. I cannot get through all my remarks in fifteen minutes.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Then I hope he may have thirty minutes, or whatever time he may desire.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to giving the gentleman thirty minutes?

Mr. BARRY. I do, unless the same time be accorded to me to reply.

Mr. ATKINS. The same time will be allowed to the other side.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. It is only fair the gentleman from Mississippi should be heard on this question so vitally important to the people of his State. He can furnish information necessary for our action on the pending measure, and we ought to have it.

Mr. PELHAM. I object to any arrangement unless the same time is given to a republican.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will have the same time.

Mr. ORTH. I do not desire it. I wish only to have the opinion of the gentleman from Mississippi in regard to legislation which I consider as creating a condition of servitude worse than slavery itself.

Mr. CONGER. I insist on the rule being followed until all have been heard.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. ORTH. I desire to say, with the consent of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] that I was not aware that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi was so limited that my interruption would destroy the whole of it. I regret that his courtesy to me has taken him from the floor, and I do hope there will be no objection on this side of the House to giving the gentleman from Mississippi at least fifteen minutes to answer the question I have propounded, or half an hour if he so desires. I have not participated in this debate and have no desire to do so. But I desire to have the gentleman from the State of Mississippi give an explanation of this most extraordinary legislation.

Mr. DAWES. I think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] of all others ought to be heard. If there be anything lacking in this debate it is the views of those who represent that part of the nation most to be affected by this legislation; and it appears to me that if anybody can aid us in this matter it is the patriotic and intelligent and honest representatives from that portion of the country most affected by this legislation. I for one desire that the gentleman from Mississippi may have the floor an hour on this question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Right.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; give him an hour.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Mississippi says he took no part in the filibustering movement which kept us here twenty-four hours, I would be glad to hear him.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know about that. I did not take any part in that filibustering movement. But I submit that the need of intelligent legislation now rises from the fact that we have heard more from those who have least to do with that section of the country most affected by this legislation and less from those who represent that section. That has been true of all our legislation in that regard; and I for one desire more to hear from those who are affected by this legislation than I do to hear from that section of the country least affected by it, and which must discuss it more from theory than from actual knowledge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the gentleman from Illinois of the committee being now entitled to proceed, it is within the power of the House at the end of that gentleman's hour to give the gentleman from Mississippi an opportunity to address the House.

Mr. DAWES. I am asked to make a motion to allow the gentleman from Mississippi to be heard. I cannot make such a motion; the rules control that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been properly recognized as a member of the committee. After that gentleman shall have occupied his hour, it will be for the House to say whether debate shall be closed. If the House shall refuse to close debate, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] will then be recognized.

Mr. KELLEY. It might be agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] rather to be able to reply to the gentleman from Mississippi than to precede that gentleman. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will be permitted to go on now.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to add a word to the request made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I trust this side of the House will not forget that we are indebted and that the country is indebted to the gentleman from Mississippi for the magnanimous sentiments he uttered on this floor in the last session of Congress, and I trust that this side of the House will not object to his having a hearing on this question.

Mr. SHANKS. I desire the House to remember another fact. There is another gentleman from Mississippi who to-day is carrying his arm in a sling because of patriotic sentiments he has uttered, and he has asked this House to hear him in answer to the other patriotic gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. Has any one objected to his being heard?

Mr. SHANKS. I am not talking to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but to the House. If anybody is to be heard here I want these patriotic gentlemen of both sides from the South to be heard. I want those who have stood up for the Union in its hour of trial to be heard as well as those whose patriotic sentiments uttered on this floor amount to but little following the blood and carnage of the last ten years.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to say a word. This appeal is made on behalf of the gentleman from Mississippi who, as I am informed, engaged in filibustering hour after hour for nearly twenty-four hours, wasting the time which might have been used for discussion. If the gentleman did not engage in that he can say so now.

Mr. LAMAR. May I be allowed a word?

Mr. COBURN. I will allow the gentleman to answer that question, whether he engaged in filibustering the other night, yes or no.

Mr. LAMAR. I distinctly said that I would reply to the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] in reference to certain statutes——

Mr. COBURN. If the gentleman will answer my question I will yield him the time; otherwise I call the regular order.

The SPEAKER. What control over the matter has the gentleman from Indiana? How does he get control of the time?

Mr. COBURN. I supposed I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so recognized.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call the regular order.

Mr. COBURN. Does the Chair object to my having unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. COBURN. I had the floor and yielded it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had the floor.

Mr. COBURN. I had unanimous consent to have the floor.

Many MEMBERS. O, no.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Indiana stated that if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] would answer the question, he would give him the floor, and the Chair did not see exactly how he could do that.

Mr. COBURN. I said I would give him the floor to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is entitled under the rules to the floor, and no other gentleman.

Mr. COBURN. I had it by unanimous consent.

Many MEMBERS. No, sir; we deny that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is upon the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] must proceed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi a portion of my time, but I have already promised to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Wisconsin, all of my time not taken by myself. Mr. Speaker, the object of government is the protection of the life, the liberty, and the property of the citizen; and a government that does not give such protection fails in the object for which it was formed, and cannot endure. The compact, it may be said, that exists between the Government and the citizen is that the citizen shall bear arms in the common defense, contribute to the revenues, and otherwise perform his duties toward the Government, and that the Government in return shall protect him in every right which he has not surrendered for the common good.

Under our form of government the power to protect the citizen in part rests in the United States and in part in the States; but states whenever the Constitution makes it the duty of or gives power to Congress to legislate for the enforcement of rights or the redress of wrongs no cry of centralization should deter us from doing our duty by giving proper legislation in the premises; and I want to say here, without disrespect to any gentleman, that much which has been said in opposition to this bill was mere declamation, consisting of glittering generalities and bitter denunciation; and it shall be my object, briefly as I must on account of the limited time I have to address the House, to inquire whether Congress has the power under the Constitution to enact the bill into law, and whether, having the power, it is necessary to exercise the same for the purpose of securing fair elections for members of Congress, guaranteeing each State a government republican in form, suppressing insurrection, preventing invasion, and enforcing the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution. And let me here state that while the proposed legislation is general in its nature, applying to all sections of the country alike, yet in fact it is alleged to be necessary on account of the state of society and violations of the Constitution and of the rights of citizens in the States lately in rebellion.

I had the honor to be designated by the House as one of a special committee during the present session to proceed to the State of Alabama for the purpose of taking testimony concerning the condition of alleged outrages in that State and make report in the premises to the House. Prior to that committees had been appointed to make similar inquiries in the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas, all of these committees have performed the duties with which they were charged, and have made reports to the House. It is impossible, however, to fully understand the present status of society in the States lately in rebellion and intelligently legislate for the same without inquiring as to the causes which led to the present deplorable condition in that portion of the country. However, as the history of the country for fifteen years past is fresh in our minds as well as the minds of the people, a bare reference to them will be sufficient.

Prior to the war labor in the Southern States was largely performed by slaves and under the direction of the whites, as will be recollected. To perpetuate the system of slavery it was necessary that the slave should be kept in ignorance; otherwise he might rebel. He was a chattel; and there was no valid marriage relation existing as to him. He was ignorant, and in no case could be a witness in the courts against a white man, nor could he acquire or hold property. The result was that his condition was but little better than that of the inferior animals, and the effect upon the superior race was detrimental in the highest degree. White labor was to a certain extent not considered honorable, because it came in competition with slave labor. Many of those who owned slaves, having almost absolute power over them, became arrogant and aggressive to all who opposed them. There was no true freedom for many years prior to the war in the slave States for either the white or black race. For the perpetuation of the system both the freedom of speech and of the press were stricken down. The result was that the South was substantially a unit as to certain policies for years before the rebellion; and being a unit, found a party North strong enough to co-operate with in controlling the Government, the South having a majority of that party and dictating its policies.

Under the doctrine of State rights, as enunciated by southern statesmen and acquiesced in by their northern allies, secession was inaugurated, the dominant party declaring that there was no power under the Constitution to coerce a sovereign State. After four years of war, the loss of three hundred thousand men the flower of the population North, and the expenditure of $5,000,000,000, the armies of the confederacy were overthrown, slavery was abolished, and secession by the force of arms failed. The people of the South had spent their substance in supporting their armies while attempting the life of the nation. Reconstruction was had; for by their own acts they were without representation in the Congress of the United States. Two policies were open to the United States; one was to restore the southern people to the rights of citizenship, enable them to reconstruct their State governments, and pardon their treason; the other was to treat the States South as Territories, governing them by the United States the same as other Territories until such time as the Government was satisfied that they could be again restored with safety to their former relations as States.

The first course was agreed upon; the United States, however, insisting that slavery should be forever prohibited by amendment of the Constitution; that the rights of citizenship should be given to the negro; in fine, that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments should be adopted. All this was done; but as reconstruction progressed our brethren South attempted by unfriendly legislation, consisting of a system of apprenticeship and ingenious penal codes, to practically establish a condition of servitude upon the part of the negro worse than that of slavery.

Suffice it to say, however, as the years rolled around reconstruction was accomplished, and the race lately in slavery were admitted to citizenship and made equal before the law with other citizens. However, the prejudice against the negro as a freeman and a citizen in the exercise of his rights as such, which was born of slavery, still existed in the minds of a large portion of the people South, especially as the negro, grateful to the party under whose lead he had been made free, refused to vote with the party which had tried to practically re-enslave him after the war. Under the Constitution they were powerless to re-enslave him or abridge his right of suffrage by State law, so they undertook to do by force, murder, and assassination, with the aid of a secret society of armed men known as the Ku-Klux, indirectly that which they could not do directly; in other words, to practically nullify the Constitution of the United States and of the States, and the heart sickens when we read the testimony taken in the Ku-Klux investigation in 1871 by a joint committee of Congress. The States were powerless to protect the freedmen and white republicans, or, having the power, did not choose to exercise it; but Congress, in the enforcement of the Constitution and the amendments, passed what is known as the enforcement and Ku-Klux acts, gave the President power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus for a limited time as necessity might require; and, thanks to proper legislation and an efficient Executive, the hand of the murderer and assassin was for a while stayed.

Having briefly glanced at these facts, I will refer to the condition of affairs in Alabama at the present time and during the last campaign, as well as in other Southern States.

The majority of the Alabama committee correctly give the status of society and political parties in that State prior to the late elections, as follows:

> There were two parties in the recent election in the State struggling for supremacy: First, the democratic party, composed, with but very few exceptions, of white men; secondly, the republican party, composed largely of colored men, with the addition of a respectable number of white men. The great body of what is usually termed "society" is found in the democractic party, as well as the men of business and property.
> The democratic party entered the contest with a determination to "carry the election at all hazards," and, as the testimony plainly shows, resorted to almost every species of intimidation, violence, and ostracism that would conduce to that result. Both white and black men in it were proscribed for the alleged reason that they were inferior, incapable, and untrustworthy by nature and in essence.
> The natural consequences of such a contest were soon developed. One side assumed the attitude of superior wisdom and superior power, and undertook to intimidate and overawe the other. Intolerance of political opinion became apparent, and was soon followed by intolerance of action. When the campaign opened republicans in many places could not hold conventions. They feared to meet for consultation or to hear addresses. Candidates announced their intention not to canvass their districts or counties, and determined not to take the risk of personal safety to be incurred in the presence of men who threatened to overpower their political opponents, to whom they applied the most insulting epithets.
> Republicans were denounced as common enemies of the "white race," whose suppression was necessary to the preservation of that race. Long before the assembling of a convention of either party in the State the democratic newspapers were filled with appeals to the white people of the State to stand as a unit against the advance of the republican party. These appeals were founded upon pretended assumptions of republican aggression, as charged by democratic politicians, in order to inflame the white men and arouse the deadliest of human passions. The democratic press of the State (see, for example, pages 475, 478,) teemed with accounts of the negroes arming and drilling in order to intimidate the whites, and of negro military companies being organized for the same unlawful purpose. Careful and pointed inquiry upon this subject totally disproved every assumption of this character, and established the further fact that not a single negro miiitia company existed or exists to-day within the borders of the State, so far as the committee was able to discover. Published in every part of the State, their truthfulness vouched for by seeming good authority, these incendiary appeals produced the desired effect, and the committee is surprised that the result of this teaching did not bring about more disastrous consequences. And the committee believe that but for the timely interference of the Administration in Louisiana affairs revolutionary measures would have been precipitated upon the people of Alabama.
> A "race issue" was thus forced upon the people of the State, an issue in which the prejudices of the white people were furiously aroused against the blacks and all those who saw fit to affiliate politically with them.

I have only time to refer to the evidence of a few witnesses and one or two articles from leading papers showing the temper of the people who determined to carry these elections at all hazards, without reference to the will of the majority. In Wacoochee Valley, in the County of Lee, the freedmen had erected three churches which they used for the purpose of worship and for school-houses. The evidence is full and conclusive that designing men circulated false reports that the negroes were about to rise, and used that as a pretext for attacking defenseless negroes and burning their churches, thereby hoping to so intimidate them as to prevent a free exercise of the right of suffrage. I read the testimony of George Sharp:

> GEORGE SHARP (colored) sworn and examined.
> By the CHAIRMAN:
>
> Question. What is your name, age, residence, and occupation?
> Answer. I am twenty-six years of age. I live now in Troup County, a mile and a quarter out of the city of La Grange, Georgia.
> Q. How long have you lived there?
>
> A. I left Alabama the last day of August last.
> Q. What did you leave the State for?
> A. Because the white men were trying to kill me. They shot at me on Saturday evening, the 31st of August. I lay in the woods that night, and Sunday I left, staid at Mr. Cape's house, and Monday morning I went to La Grange. On the Monday before this last I came down and got my family and moved them away.
> Q. Are you afraid to go back and live at your home?
> A. Yes, sir. Since I have come back my employer told me there was no danger. Some hav e told me there was danger. Mrs. Blackmar told me not to stay here, however,
> Q. Wha t happened the week before you left—what occurred that made you go away?
> A. The week before I le ft we had political meetings. There was a convention at Opelika. I think the dem ocrats had a convention. They said we had a right to have our political meetings and send delegates up here to this convention. We did so. We had our meetings in the night, and they wanted to know what we meant by having them at night. We stated that we did not mean any harm at all, but we hated to meet and lose a day. They told us to have our meetings in the day, and we would have the privilege of running for any office we wanted. We had our meetings then in the day. One Thursday we had a meeting at three o'clock, at Pleasant Hill church. Several white folks were there. Pope Mangum and Mr. Piper were there at the time I was speaking.
> Q. Were those democrats or republicans?
> A. They were democrats. After I got done speaking the chairman of our meeting asked them if there was any insult spoken on either side, and they said no, that there was nothing said to hurt anybody, and they said that was a very nice speech for a colored man. This occurred on Thursday evening. Our large spiritual meeting was going on at the same time, and my wife's sister got ahead of me to carry her children down. I went, although I did not want to. I did not know that the white folks were making up a meeting to run on us at the valley. After I got down there I found them approaching. Bryant and McCullough came to our church and called me out. He asked me what we were up to. I told him nothing. I asked him why he asked me such a question as that. He said he heard that there was going to be a riot up there that night, and that we were going to kill the white folks. I told him that there was not a gun or pistol on the land. I told him I had one in my pocket; that my life had been threatened, and I had a right to carry it. I told him that there were not thirty men there. He saw that there was not, and said he would go back and tell the men to go home. He told us to have our meeting, and break up in peace and go home. We did so. That was still on Thursday night. When we broke up our meeting, some of the boys at our meeting went down in the valley, and they said there were about five hundred men, whose guns were stacked up in the street.
> Q. How far is the valley from the church?
> A. About three hundred yards, as near as I can get at it. They came back, as I said, and told us that there was a club of white men going to do some harm that night.
> Q. Describe the white men. Were they armed or mounted?
>
> A. Yes, sir; they were all armed; they were all riding.
> Q. Were they disguised, or were they just with their common clothing on?
> A. They had their common clothing on. They were drinking whisky, I was told. I did not see that. Our colored people all said they were going home, for the reason that we did not want to have a riot with the white folks. I staid out in the old field with Nathan Griffin and another to see what devilment they were going to do. They ran down in the valley and began shooting, and then came back and set the church on fire. After it got burning well they came back and ran up the road crying fire. The church blazed up so that we got out of the field. They were riding in the field to see who of us they could see; that was the reason we left it, the light was so bright. They said if they could run all the radicals out of that country they could live.
> Q. Did they say anything else about the radicals?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Did they ever make any threats to injure them or kill them?
>
> A. Yes, sir. Wilbur Crofford and Pooch Collins came down to Mr. Terry Collin's grocery, which is in Alabama, near Chambers. It was a country store. I was sitting by the door. He came on and kicked me on the right thigh, and said, "What are you doing here?" I said I came to get Mr. Collins to shoe my horse; and he said, "Yes, God damn you, I am going to kill you for your big talking and speaking." I told him I had not done anything wrong. He then went out in the grocery room to get his whisky, and Charles Ellis came out and told me to get away, that the white men were going to kill me. Pooch Collins had a great big hickory club. Charles Ellis was a black man. I left there, asking him to bring my horse back. I had to leave my horse there and go home. They were going to kill me because Nathan Griffin and myself were delegates to this convention. They did not like that.
> Q. How long before the convention was that?
> A. That was the week before the convention.
> Q. Did you go up to the convention?
> A. Yes, sir; I was one of the delegates; this was a county convention; we were to nominate delegates, I think, to go to Montgomery.
> Q. Do you remember particularly what these men said there the day they run you off from the blacksmith's shop; was there anything more said or any more threats made to you?

A. No, sir; I went right home, leaving my horse; that was about two weeks before I left Alabama.

Q. Do you know of any other church being burned on the night of the church burning?

A. Yes, sir; I saw the Ebenezer Valley church set on fire.

Q. Who set that on fire?

A. Wilbur Crawford and Bob Tanksley.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Did you see anybody else?

A. There was nobody else that I saw.

Q. They were the only two together?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Nobody else with them?

A. No, sir; there were men standing down the road.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How many men; was there a crowd?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. Were they armed?

A. Yes, sir; they had their guns. They were on horseback.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were there any other churches burned that day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How far off were they?

A. There was another church about a mile and a half from Wacoochee Valley, beyond the Wacoochee Valley Creek. I saw the light of it, but I did not see it set on fire.

Q. Was there another one burned?

A. Yes, sir; these two that were burned were colored Methodist churches. The third one was a mile and a half beyond the valley.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. Were those churches used for school-houses?

A. Yes, sir; this that was burned at Mechanicsville was a school-house.

Q. Did you ever use these churches for any other meetings besides religious meetings?

A. Yes, sir; we used them for political meetings. They burned them because they wanted to break us up from having our political meetings. They tried to run us off before the election came off; we had no other place to hold our political meetings and we held them in the churches. They were our own churches; the white folks said it was our privilege to have our meetings, and we held them in our own churches.

Q. Were those frame or log churches?

A. Two of them were frame, and the Wacoochee Valley church was a log church.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State whether there were any men belonging to the White League in your country.

A. I never heard any talk of that.

Q. State whether the democrats had any meetings down there.

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever go to one of their meetings?

A. No, sir; they invited me, but I would not go.

Q. State whether the democrats ever invited you to join their party, and offered you protection.

A. Old Terry Collins sent for me to see me; I asked Mr. Glass about it, and he told me I had better go. I went up; when I arrived at Collins's grocery, there was a large crowd of men there, and they had guns setting up on the counter. Terry said to me, "I am glad to see you; if it had not been for me, last night, you would have been dead and in the river." I was afraid to go in when I saw the guns and the men. He said I should not be hurt; I walked in. Some got in the doorway, and Terry went behind his counter and drew his pen and ink, and what I said he wrote down. He said, "There were fifteen men there last night; they had a grass rope as big as my arm, and guns, and were going to kill you, and I stopped them." He then said, "If you will promise me that you will not have anything more to do with these political meetings and join the democratic club, I will give you as much whisky as you can drink, and come with me and go to Beulah and vote," That was before the election. He said, "Now is your time; you have got to do one or the other, and if you do not go we will go for you; here are the men right here." I told them that I would not have anything to do with either party, and they let me off with that. That is the truth.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Who was there that heard that?

A. I do not know; there was a house full of men. I did not notice who they were.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were they republicans or democrats?

A. They were democrats; they tried to get me to join them. They knew I could read and write, and they cut off my papers, and would not let me get them from the post-office. Pooch Collins and Wilbur Crawford were the postmasters. If I went up to get papers, they would get me, and I never got any more papers.

Q. Were you afraid to go to the post-office.

A. Yes, sir; they had attempted to kill me, and I knew they would do it if I had not left.

There is much more testimony bearing upon the same matter, but I have not time to read further.

The evidence also shows that pledge meetings were held by the democracy, in which they bound themselves not to employ negroes who voted the republican ticket. This is a fearful means of intimidation to the ignorant negro lately freed, without property and with nothing standing between him and starvation but the proceeds of his daily labor.

I also read the evidence of E. M. Kiels touching the destruction of the ballot-box at Spring Hill, in Barbour County, and homicide of his son and his evidence is corroborated by an Army officer and others. Indeed, there is no testimony tending to contradict his statement of the facts; nor has there been any prosecution of the persons who committed these outrages in the State courts. The testimony is as follows:

ELIAS M. KIELS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State whether there were any deeds of violence perpetrated within your sight or hearing on the day of the election. If so, by whom and by what party? State in what the deeds consisted.

Answer. I was at Spring Hill, as United States supervisor, on the day of the election, the 3d of November. That is eighteen miles from Eufaula, in the same county. Everything went along there quietly until about eleven o'clock that day, when a disturbance commenced outside. I was in the room; I did not see that, but I heard the reports of the guns; there were several guns fired; when these guns were fired the democrats present—I suppose seventy-five or one hundred—ran to a house near by, Cody's store, where it was understood before that there were guns stored. They got those guns and paraded the streets there from that time until night. Some of them had two guns.

Q. What did they do with the arms?

A. They threatened to shoot anybody that did not do exactly to suit them. That was pretty generally the talk.

Q. What was the nature of their threats; were they personal, political, or how?

A. Political threats; but they would talk in this way: "We are going to make these damned negroes behave themselves. If they don't, we will kill out the last one of them." That was about the amount of it.

Q. What sort of arms were those?

A. Some of them were new double-barreled guns, and some not new. Some were rifles; but they were mostly shot-guns. There were a great many new double-barreled guns among them.

Q. Did Cody have those guns there for sale?

A. No, sir; this store was vacant.

Q. How did those guns get there?

A. I was informed that they were deposited there.

Q. When and by whom?

A. I was at Spring Hill and made a speech on Tuesday before the election, and I was notified then that those guns were in that house. I got to Spring Hill on the morning of the election, and the republican challenger, a colored man, told me that the guns were still in that house, and that he asked Cody the day before why they were there, and Cody told him they were to keep the peace on the day of the election. That colored man's name is Green Burch. He lives in Spring Hill precinct. Perhaps Cody's remark was to make the negroes behave themselves. It was something of that sort. His full name is Michael Cody. He resides at Spring Hill.

Q. State what was done at the time the ballot-box was destroyed, and how it was destroyed.

A. The polls were closed at five o'clock, as the law requires. One of the clerks got ready to go to counting out the votes in ten or fifteen minutes. The other clerk did not get his poll-sheets ready until just at dark, The managers were hurrying, but failed to get them ready. The clerk's name was Thomas Swanson. When he got them ready he got up without saying a word to anybody, went to the door and opened it. That door had been barred several times to keep the crowd out, and the last time, when the crowd was very boisterous, I went and barred it myself good and strong. It took him some time to open it. As soon as he started to that door the crowd of democrats moved to it, as though they understood what he was going there for. As soon as he got the bar from the door they ran against it and came in, and then they commenced a promiscuous firing. A portion of them ran for the light and knocked that out. The instant before the light was put out several of the crowd commenced firing, as I could see, at me, and balls did go in the wall just above my head; but that was only for an instant, until the light was out, and then it was a promiscuous shooting all around that room. The managers had run away, as I found afterward, and there was no one in there but myself and my son. They did not touch me, but murdered my son.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How old was your son?

A. If he had lived he would have been seventeen years of age on the third day of this month.

Q. How was he murdered?

A. He was shot; three balls entered his thigh and one his bowels; that was the shot that killed him.

Q. Was he near you when he was hit?

A. He had his hand on my shoulder when he was hit.

Q. How soon did he die?

A. That occurred on Tuesday night, and he lived until Thursday at half past three.

Q. Where was the ballot-box destroyed?

A. It was destroyed at that time. I never saw any more after the light went out.

Q. How long after this firing did you remain in the house?

A. I can hardly tell; I could not keep much time just then, because there were twenty-five guns firing every second, or even more; I was there two or three minutes, perhaps.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What was said, if anything, within your hearing about the time of the firing and of the destruction of the ballot-box?

A. The remark I heard, maybe a hundred times, was, "Kill him; damn him, kill him." That was me, of course; because I was the United States supervisor in the room. I supposed that was the reason they said it.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. You were appointed by the district court as supervisor?

A. I was appointed by the United States circuit court.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there a democratic supervisor?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Where was he?

A. He had not been there for an hour before that.

Q. What was his name?

A. Dr. J. M. Barr.

Q. Were there only two supervisors for that precinct?

A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How many ballots were put into the box that day?

A. Seven hundred and thirty-two.

Q. How do you know that?

A. I saw them go in.

Q. Did you keep a tally to know that that was the correct number?

A. I stood by that table all day, and saw one of the inspectors number them as they came in.

Q. You saw the figures on the papers?

A. Yes, sir; and I saw the poll-lists where they were numbered.

Q. State whether more black than white men voted that day?

A. I will tell you the reason why I was more particular about noticing the precise number. In 1872 we had a supervisor who was a colored man, and they refused to let him into the room, and cheated the republicans out of the entire vote at Spring Hill; in other words, the votes went in republican but were counted out democratic. That is one reason why I went there that time as supervisor.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT:

Q. What was the relative strength of the parties at your poll on this day; what proportion of the seven hundred and twenty-three was republican and democratic?

A. I am satisfied that at least five-sixths were republicans.

Q. What proportion of the vote was white and colored?
A. The republicans were nearly all colored. The only white republicans that I know that voted there were one from another precinct and one who lives there.

Mr. Kiels further testifies:

Half or three quarters of an hour before this disturbance commenced my son and I heard them saying out in the crowd that the Spring Hill ballot-box would control the election in the county. He said, "Now you see very plainly that there is going to be a disturbance here. They will come in here and destroy this ballot-box, and of course they will kill you, because you are a United States supervisor here." He said, "You had better let me go after Lieutenant Turner and his men to come up here." I said, "You can go after him." I let him out of the door, and he went as far as he could walk, and came back and said that Lieutenant Turner told him that he was ordered by Captain Daggett, at Eufaula, not to go about the place there at all. That is something I had never suspected before. When he came back and told me that, if I could have gotten out of that door and got away I should have gone; but it would have been certain death to have undertaken to have gone. I knew that, and therefore thought the safest way would be to stay in there, which I did. The next morning I asked Turner why he did not bring his men there. I wanted to see if he would tell me what he told my son, and he showed me a dispatch that he had from Daggett that came over the wires that morning, forbidding him to go about the polling-place at all, or allow his men to go there for any purpose.

Q. What were Swanson's politics?
A. Democratic.
Q. What were the politics of the other clerks?
A. All democrats. Daniel Persons was a colored inspector there.
Q. Was that under the State law?
A. Yes. He was a republican. The others were all democrats—clerks and inspectors.
Q. Before this door was unbarred and broken in, you speak of a good deal of disturbance outside. Who was making that disturbance, if you could observe?
A. It was that crowd of democrats.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. Were those citizens of the country that were engaged in these disturbances?
A. Yes, sir. There may have been some others that were not citizens, but they were nearly all so.
Q. In fact the vote of that precinct was not returned at all, on account of the destruction of the ballot-boxes?
A. There was no return made of it.

As a specimen of the manner in which they carry on elections on the border of Alabama by the aid of the citizens of Georgia, and ministers of the Gospel, too, from another county than the one where the election was being held, I will cite the testimony of Hon. CHARLES PELHAM, a native of the South, and a man whose testimony is above suspicion, as follows, (page 1204:)

I saw boys not twelve years old so drunk that they had to be supported to the polls. They voted the democratic ticket every time. I saw boys from Auburn College, a military college established in Lee County, Alabama, vote with their uniforms on. I did not know their names; I could not find them out. They were very tight. It is a military school founded by the United States.
Q. What tickets did those repeaters, boys, vote?
A. They voted the democratic ticket, so far as I could see, every time.
Q. What do you know of parties coming from Columbus, Georgia, to vote, if anything?
A. They came in great squads, came in express-wagons in great droves. I noticed one man voting. I thought I had seen him before. I looked at him and asked him if he was not from Clay County. He told me yes. I asked him what he was voting here in Girard for. He said he was over in Columbus with a drove of beeves; they were all voting, "so I can vote, and I am going to do it." His name is Scarborough, a Baptist minister in good standing in Clay County, Alabama, and in charge of two churches there. He voted the democratic ticket, and the men with him driving beeves, from the same county, did so. He said that he was over in Columbus selling the beef. I saw men with their hands full of new half-dollars, fractional currency, offering it publicly, in violation of the statutes, to negroes to vote.
Q. Were they white men?
A. Yes, sir, and prominent democratic politicians. I saw them offering that to voters; saw men take it, and saw them vote.

By Mr. BUCKNER:

Q. Can you give us the name of any prominent man of that sort?
A. No, sir. Republicans would not do it who ever expected to go back down there. I would not have asked one of their names that day.
Q. You say they were prominent politicians?
A. They were taking a prominent part in the election that day; well-dressed, intelligent men, and men of fine appearance. I saw one man come over from Columbus and hand over a pile of bills to a man who had been doing that all the evening, and saw him unroll it and go to work with it in the crowd, with drunken negroes and white people. I called the attention of prominent democrats to it time and again.
Q. What was the complexion of this election board as to politics?
A. There was one republican inside the box. An old colored man, a republican, named Elihu Moriner, was one of the managers outside; a man named Collins was a manager inside.
Q. Was it one republican and two democrats?
A. I was informed so. I did not go inside.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. How did that poll count; how was it announced that night?
A. That night it was announced that the republicans carried the election by about a hundred majority.
Q. Was it announced by the election officials after it was counted?
A. Yes, sir. A certificate was given by the election officials that we carried it by about one hundred majority.
Q. What did you do after that?
A. There had been so much counting out of votes there that I went down, when the election was over, to Seals Station, the county seat of this county, to see the vote concentrated. That box was not sent in for several days; but then it was brought in at eleven o'clock at night, to the court-house, under very suspicious circumstances, by those same men who performed so extensively up at Girard that day. When it was opened I do not think it had fifty republican tickets in it. The tickets had never been folded. In voting a ticket or folding it up in any way, and holding it in hand to vote, will rumple it a little, or show some little mark, and those ballots that day were as smooth and straight as that envelope is now, and there was not a particle more soil on it. They were perfectly clean, smooth, and straight, and not a crease from one end to the other, and had evidently not been put in as votes by the voters. They were strung on a string together. There were about a hundred votes that had been voted, democratic and republican votes, which showed handling, and the others never had been handled. That was in the presence of Judge Patterson, and the sheriff and judge of probate and the clerk of the county, who were all democrats except Judge Patterson; and I reckon that there is not one of them there when they were opened who would not admit that none of them that had not been folded had been voted by a voter.
Q. I understand that they showed a hundred majority; but when you came to count the ballots what did they show?
A. I think there was about fifty republican votes.
Q. And the balance democratic?
A. Yes; thirteen hundred.
Q. Under your election law, is it made the duty of the canvassing board to compare the poll-list with the ballot?
A. Yes, sir; and there were not fifty republican votes in the box.
Q. What evidences did you see as to the box being tampered with?
A. The box was split open and had been glued back, and nails were driven in it.
Q. Does there have to be actual violence to constitute intimidation?
A. So far as intimidation was concerned, there was intimidation at every place in the district I was at, and I was in every place in the county. I canvassed that county all over.

As indicative of the animus of the democracy in that State, I read from a single article from the Opelika Times, September 30, 1874, a democratic paper, which is a fair sample of the tone of the democratic press in that State as shown by many extracts in the testimony:

This campaign has in it the single issue of qualification for offices—the best men at the helm in this political storm! All men who subscribe to this principle stand forth as enemies to radicalism, and are morally bound to hold radicals as alien enemies without the pale of recognition in all the relations of life, particularly in those relations that affect the individual success of men in their financial enterprises. The most potent agency that is within the compass of our using to teach the radical the iniquity of his machinations, and to compel him to respect the claims of civilization and the imperious wants of the people, is the withdrawal of our moneyed support. Let his ship ply without a cargo, or rot unmanned in a breezeless ocean. Let his door of commerce stand open and neglected, with the blood of a slaughtered country sprinkled upon its lintel, a curse upon and a warning to venality. Touch him not, nor his goods, nor his cattle, nor anything that he has. Let him dance to his own piping, and count no profits from the hard earnings of a people he has sought to destroy, and a race that he has abandoned, and a section of country that he has scandalized by living in it. The adder that stings should find no warmth in the bosom of the dying victim. The man who curses woman, children, race, country, and his God may not hope for Apollo's laurel until he first finds absolution in the sackcloth of repentance. Reparation these radical scalawags can never make, but further scourging of the people they can cease, and we can force them by non-intercourse, if they yield not to entreaty. Free thought, free speech, and free action are only constitutional guarantees so long as their exercise promotes the good of the body-politic. The freedom of action and thought and speech of Titus Oates and Benedict Arnold were outside the protection of the Magna Charta. The Constitution ostracises freedom when it becomes licentious, and freemen when they become traitors and marplots. Honesty (if it be possible for a scalawag) is no protection, nor even an excuse for the hand of an assassin. The thing done is measure of transgression in politics, without respect to the motive of doing it. Politically considered, an honest radical is just as culpable as a dishonest one. They are alike enemies to civilization and the South, with all her interests, and our last and only means to be used for their overthrow is to fall back upon the old Wesleyan doctrine to "prefer one another in business."

If there be a colored man who is willing to recognize the necessity of putting Alabama under the rule of intelligence, he becomes our friend, and he should be preferred as tenant of our houses, cabooses on the farm, drayman upon the streets, sexton of the church, and in every way right and proper sustained and built up. Merchants, mechanics, and tradesmen of every character have a right to expect and demand support from and at the hands of those with whom they are allied in this great struggle for reform, while the radical cannot have the effrontery to even ask a "fish" without the rational expectation of receiving a "stone." Every man who sustains a scalawag individually contributes to building up radicalism. The way to kill the party is to put upon "short allowance" its individual members. The sea is open—the sky is beautiful—victory is ours!

The testimony further shows that as a rule white republicans, whether northern or southern born, Federal or confederate soldiers, rich or poor, educated or ignorant, honest or dishonest, with their families, are ostracized socially at the fireside, in the church, in the school, and proscribed in business, and in many portions of the State that their lives are unsafe—to make a long story short, that for white republicans who dare to exercise the rights of a freeman as citizens of the North exercise those rights, Alabama becomes for them a hell on earth.

W. P. Billings, a white man who formerly lived in Missouri, saw proper to take his wife and children and find a home in Sumter County, Alabama. He bought a plantation and sought to make a living by labor; admitted to be a good citizen and industrious man. He was waylaid as he was returning from a republican meeting by a band of assassins and killed, as the circumstances show, for no reason in the world but that he was a prominent republican leader. In a few days afterward Thomas L. Ivey, a colored mail agent and a republican, while in performance of his duties on the train was killed. The train was flagged and halted and he was riddled with bullets. His death by assassination was chronicled by a leading democratic newspaper published at Meridian, Mississippi, as follows:

ASSASSINATION OF A COLORED MAIL AGENT.

Yesterday afternoon, as the Alabama and Chattanooga train was coming this way, about three miles beyond York, and six this way from Livingston, a man stood upon the track and flagged the train down with his hat. Charlie Briggs was the engineer, and stopped his train. Immediately as the train stopped, some three to six shots, variously stated by eye-witnesses, were fired at Thomas L. Ivey, the colored mail agent. He is said to have uttered a single exclamation of pain, and, from the terrible character of the wounds, was doubtless killed instantly after. The train brought the body on to this city. It is supposed that Ivey came to the door of the car to observe what the train was stopped for, and so gave his slayers the fair opportunity they wanted. It is said there were assailants on both sides of the train. Their work was quick and decisive, and they disappeared in the brush, and no one of all the people about the train recognized any one.

Our good friends "across the border" will allow us to use this item, which came from their State, and take notice that we make no charge against the Sumter County democrats, and "insinuate" nothing except, from what is deemed reliable information, that the deceased was a dangerous man to the peace of the community.

And after diligent inquiry the only crime Mr. Ivey was guilty of was that of being a prominent man with his race and saw proper to exercise the rights of a citizen in matters of politics—the fastidious way of putting it, in the language just quoted from the Meridian paper, "A dangerous man to the peace of the community."

But I have no time to read further from this evidence. I will merely refer to the Eufaula riot, where the democratic whites were fully armed and organized, and during the election, taking advantage of an altercation in reference to the legality of a negro vote, fired upon the negroes, killing many of them and wounding near one hundred more, chasing the negroes as they fled, cheering over the dead bodies of the fallen, and wanting the Yankees to come on for their share. The feeling of exultation is shown from the following dispatch to the Montgomery Morning News the morning after the riot:

Big riot to-day. Several killed and many others hurt—some badly—but none of our friends among them. The white man's goose hangs high. Three cheers from Eufaula.—Morning News, November 4, 1874.

And in passing allow me also to call attention to the Mobile riots on the day of election, where many negroes (republicans) were wounded and many killed. By request of the democratic central committee, which request was equal to a command, all places of business were closed in the city and the whole white population, many of them armed, were upon the streets and surrounding the polls at the different wards. With couriers mounted to carry dispatches and commands from democratic headquarters from place to place, and over one hundred democratic deputy sheriffs, generally armed, it is not strange that riots were constantly taking place; and, as General Withers in his evidence in substance aptly expresses it, all this organization and acting upon the part of the democracy, even if they had not fired a shot, was the most effective kind of intimidation to unarmed and timid negroes. Nor have I time to cite the evidence showing how desperate men from Mississippi came into Alabama at various points to assist like desperate men in chasing and hunting negroes (republicans) who were guilty of no crime but that of being republicans in politics. Nor have I time more than to refer to the massacre of negroes at Vicksburgh, whose humble friends were prevented from giving the bodies burial through fear; so the bodies, mutilated, for days and weeks lay without burial, with no more attention than would be given to the carcass of a hog, and this, too, almost within sight of the corporation.

I can only pause long enough to refer to the fact that bad men, organized and armed, stand ready, in defiance of all law, to go from Texas to Mississippi, from Mississippi to Alabama, and from all of these States to Louisiana, to subvert all law, both State and Federal, and with a strong hand hunt down republicans, kill negroes, burn churches and school-houses, depose officers of a State or county, or subvert and revolutionize a State government. The testimony of the different investigating committees shows all this and much more. I do not mean to say that all democrats in Alabama and elsewhere South commit these outrages or approve them. On the contrary, there are many good men South, democrats, who deplore this condition of society. But it is also true that these bad men are sufficient in numbers to boldly and defiantly commit all these acts and so control public opinion that no redress whatever for outrages of this kind can be had in the courts. And while I have no doubt, so far as judges of courts are concerned, in most instances, that they declare the law correctly when called upon to make rulings, yet cases ordinarily can only be disposed of with the aid of juries and healthy public opinion. With the foregoing state of society as a rule, the juries will not or do not help administer the law so as to protect republican citizens, especially negroes, in their rights, so far as personal security is concerned, and punish men who commit political crimes heretofore spoken of; and while Justice may perhaps be still, so far as the judges are concerned, represented with her eyes bandaged, holding the balances, yet she should also be represented as bound both hand and foot by public opinion, and powerless to make and enforce her decrees; and, strange as it may appear, the testimony shows since the war but one white man has been convicted for homicide of a negro in the whole State of Alabama, yet when our democratic friends are called upon to explain, justify, or condemn this state of affairs, they generally deny, or if they admit in part seek to palliate or justify, by saying that the people of Alabama have been under the rule of the republican carpet-baggers, who are fattening upon the misfortunes of the people, and that those manifestations are only the violent protests of a generous people against such a state of things.

Now, what are the facts as to carpet-baggers in Alabama? The testimony of George H. Patrick (see page 484) is as follows:

Question. Have you ever had your attention directed to the number of carpet-baggers in this State in any way?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state to the committee how carefully you have directed your attention in that direction and what facts you have ascertained.

A. I shall have to state now entirely from memory the number of carpet-baggers, or northern men, who are residents in the State, and that, I think, is not over one hundred and fifty.

Q. Have you had means of ascertaining that fact?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How recently did you make a calculation of that kind?

A. During the last two or three years I have had constantly in my office the list of nearly, if not quite, every northern man in the State who has been in the Federal Army.

Q. State, if you know, how many of those men have occupied official positions as State officers since reconstruction.

A. There have been three northern men who have held State offices since reconstruction.

Q. How many northern men have held county offices, so far as you know, since reconstruction?

A. Some twenty-five, and perhaps thirty.

Q. State how many of those have been official defaulters.

A. To my knowledge, not one. I mean to say that I have heard of no such default.

Q. Have you had means of knowing the facts in relation to that matter, and have you directed your attention to that matter?

A. I think I have.

Q. What is your business?

A. I am a practicing lawyer, and reside in Montgomery.

Q. Have you heard the charges made against carpet-baggers, that they were a set of robbers and thieves and plunderers, and men imposing on the people of the South?

A. I have heard such general charges.

By Mr. CANNON:

Q. How many other than carpet-baggers have held office in this same length of time in your State?

A. There are some fifteen hundred or more county officers in the State, elected by the people every two years.

Q. That would make, since reconstruction, eight years ago, between five thousand and six thousand other than carpet-baggers who have held office?

A. At least that. I am the commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, and know who the republicans are here.

So you see there is nothing in the cry of carpet-baggers, so far as Alabama is concerned, except in the imagination of zealous democrats, virtuous correspondents, and the democratic press, and a portion of the so-called independent press—called independent, I suppose, because it is generally independent in misrepresentation without reference to the facts. My State of Illinois no doubt can show many times this number of men elected to office who come from the Southern States since 1867, yet there is no cry about carpet-baggers. While speaking of Illinois State or county officers, and that I may not be misunderstood, let me state that I am not the apologist of corruption in office of anybody or of any party, nor do I claim that all republicans or republican officials in Alabama are or have been honest.

Grave responsibilities are resting upon the people of Alabama and other Southern States. Many of the whites are ignorant and lawless, and most of the negroes are ignorant, ordinarily well disposed, but owing to their poverty and former condition many of them incline to commit petit larcenies and smaller grades of offenses. What is needed is a thorough enforcement of the law, protection to all citizens; especially in their rights of personal security, and general education, and until all these are given I do not see much chance for prosperity in the South. But our democratic friends tell us that the difficulty is that the negroes are ignorant and will not divide their votes between the parties, but insist on voting the republican ticket. I have no doubt it would be better if all parties would acknowledge the equality of all men before the law in practice as well as theory; and until this is done by democrats South, instead of resorting to force and intimidation, how can they expect the negroes will vote with them, and how can they criticise with justice the negroes for not dividing their votes between the two parties when the more intelligent whites are seeking to divide on the color line, and resort to ostracism, proscription, and some of them to murder and assassination to accomplish their purpose?

But it is useless to speak further of these matters All will acknowledge the necessity for action. The gentleman from Connecticut, for whom I entertain great respect, acknowledges the wrongs to be remedied; also that the States have not and probably will not remedy them, and that they will have to go without a remedy, for the reason the United States has no power in the premises. I agree with him that Congress can only give relief by legislation where authority is given under the Constitution, but I also claim that the Constitution covers the proposed legislation.

I have no patience with some gentlemen who admit the necessity for action, but quietly fold their arms, while the blood of the slain cries from the ground and the moan of the widow and orphan are heard as protests against the most foul taking-off of the husband and father, and search with a microscope for a fancied want of power to legislate, or cry conciliation and peace, peace, when there is no peace for these citizens of the United States, if they persist in exercising their rights in voting as they see proper, but the peace of the grave.

Article 1, section 4, of the Constitution is as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

I believe this power was not exercised until since the war. I suppose some gentlemen are inclined to deny the power because it was not exercised by Congress earlier. Under this power to regulate the time, place, and manner, we can provide the whole or any portion of the machinery by which such elections are held, and this includes the power to provide for the punishment of any offense, even murder, provided it was committed in the attempt to constrain suffrage touching a congressional election. As to the expediency of the legislation there can be no doubt. A member of Congress from Maine or Alabama has just as much power by his vote to affect the whole country as has one from any other State. So the people of Illinois are just as much interested practically in the fair election of the member from Maine or Alabama as they are in the fair election of the member from Illinois; and the framers of the Constitution no doubt placed this provision in it for the reason that as the whole country is to be affected by these elections, so the United States should have the power to make such provisions by law to secure fairness in the same as to the law-making power should seem proper.

Article 4, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

Under this section the duty of the United States is imperative to guarantee each State a republican form of government—and form in this connection means in substance as well as form—and protect each State against invasion. In my opinion, the power of Congress in enforcing this section extends to affirmative legislation, and the history of the country since 1860 demonstrates the necessity of such legislation under this clause of the Constitution. No one denies to the majority of the people of a State the right to change their fundamental law, but suppose by assent or aid of the governor or governor and Legislature of a State, with or without the aid of lawless men from other States, a State government is overthrown against the will of the majority and a new government founded, it being the only government in fact and republican in form after the revolution is accomplished. I submit that the probabilities are the United States could not interfere, although the majority of the people may be overridden and have a government fastened upon them without their assent. It will be recollected that this was done substantially about the breaking out of the late war in Tennessee and Arkansas, and perhaps other Southern States. The efforts of Governor Jackson, of Missouri, in this direction especially will be recollected.

Does any one doubt, if under this clause of the Constitution Congress had prior to 1860 enacted a law to punish invasion of a State for the purpose of forcibly overthrowing an existing State government and conspiracies or the attempt by force or violence to subvert or usurp a State government, and that there had been an early attempt in good faith by the United States to enforce such law—I say does any one doubt but the late civil war would have been prevented? Legislation should, if possible, be preventive in its nature; or, to use a phrase that every one understands, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

It does appear to me that the power of Congress in the premises to affirmatively legislate cannot be successfully denied. But gentlemen may say there is no necessity for this legislation, for in the event of invasion of the State or the usurpation of a State government by domestic violence the United States shall afford protection on demand of the governor, &c. I am now putting a case where the governor is in the conspiracy and the Legislature is not in session; or where the governor, by assassination, imprisonment, or for any other reason, does not make application. Gentlemen may say that will not happen. In reply I call attention to facts. It did happen in many States at the breaking out of the war. Or, take the case of the attempted revolution in Louisiana a few months ago. The Legislature was not in session. If Governor Kellogg had failed to call on the President or had been imprisoned so he could not, or assassinated, had the United States no power to give relief in such cases? Is it pretended that Congress has no power to provide by general law to carry out the provisions of this article, even if the governor or Legislature are opposed to the enforcement of this provision of the Constitution?

If gentlemen are serious in this view, then this section of the Constitution means, according to their position, that the United States shall protect each of the States against invasion and domestic violence except where the governor is assassinated or imprisoned so he cannot call upon the President, or where he is unlawfully and forcibly using his position to revolutionize and subvert the State government, as in the case of Missouri and others of the States at the commencement of the late war; and in those cases and many others that may happen anarchy, revolution, and invasion, conducted by a few or many well-organized desperate men may run riot in a State, overawing the weak and timid and subverting the State government, and still the United States must sit idly by without power to afford relief. Such a construction of this provision of the Constitution would defeat the very object for which it was made. It is said by gentlemen, however, that the invasion spoken of is foreign invasion, and that the United States has no power to protect one State against invasion from another. I have no time to combat this position, nor is it necessary. I will merely refer to the opinion of Justice Story in his work on the Constitution, where it is laid down, among other matters, (section 1818,) in speaking of the meaning of this provision that—

The latitude of the expression here used seems to secure each State not only against foreign hostility, but against ambitious and vindictive enterprises of its more powerful neighbors.

The principal object of the bill under consideration, however, is to protect citizens of the United States residing in the different States in the right to vote, especially at congressional elections, in the enforcement of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. These amendments are as follows:

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

ARTICLE XV.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The history of the adoption of these amendments I have before referred to, and is fresh in the recollection of all; and while to my mind the grant of power by the constitution implies necessarily the duty to do all things by legislation or otherwise necessary to enforce the same, but let that be as it may here there can be no possible doubt, for each one of the amendments gives expressly to Congress the power to enforce the same by appropriate legislation. I have before shown the necessity of protection to both white and black citizens in the State of Alabama as well as other Southern States, provided a free ballot is maintained, and also the means that are being used to constrain or "abridge suffrage." Yet gentlemen talk about the want of power to give the protection, and the democratic press, and the so-called independent press talk about the attempted usurpation on the part of Congress in passing this bill. I suppose the independent democratic press gets information as to want of power from conservative gentlemen here, and the conservative gentlemen in turn get their information from the independent democratic press. I commend the gentlemen and the press to the Constitution; by its provisions I am willing that this bill should stand or fall.

By the blood of three hundred thousand brave men, by the expenditure of untold treasure, by a new charter of freedom as embodied in the constitutional amendments, the United States has decreed that the spirit of intolerance and bloodshed that grew out of slavery should be no more. A new name has been given to the recent slave. He is now called citizen, freeman, exercising in his own right, in common with all other citizens, sovereignty. The whole people are pledged to guarantee to him the free exercise of these rights upon the same terms as all other citizens enjoy them; and let me say to gentlemen who are lukewarm that the people have decreed that these pledges and guarantees shall be kept.

But the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] said ten years have now passed since the war closed and still there is anarchy, bloodshed, and confusion, and sometimes revolution too, down South, and as a cure-all cries stop these extreme measures and hold out the olive branch of peace to these people and let us have an era of quiet, peace, and good-will over all this country.

I always listen to my friend with pleasure; he talks well; he is a minister of the Gospel, for which I honor him. He is in favor of the millennium; so am I; but let me say to him that if as legislators we stand by and cry peace and good-will to all men, when red-handed murder stalks at noonday in Louisiana, portions of Alabama, and elsewhere in the South, finding victims both white and black by the hundred who are guilty of no crime except exercising their political rights under the Constitution, when we by prompt and proper legislation can stay this tide of evil, when the millennium arrives, these citizens may, in common with he and I, enjoy peace; but if they do, it will be the peace of the grave.

Mr. Speaker, I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the founder of our religion was crucified over eighteen hundred years ago. His teachings are the best the world ever saw, yet all the people of the world do not believe or practice them. What would the gentleman think if I were to say, "Sir, the Christian religion cannot prevail; it has been tried for eighteen hundred years and has failed to have a third part of the people of the world for its followers; compromise with infidelity; meet error half way." The gentleman would not advocate such a measure, for the moment the vital principles of Christianity are compromised in the least, Christianity ceases to exist with the parties that make the compromise.

By the plain provisions of the Constitution the rights of all citizens, black and white, are clearly defined. Let all the people, North and South, respect the rights of all men, and then you do not need an olive-branch. Any permanent compromise with lawlessness at the expense of the rights of a portion of the people not only would but ought to destroy the government that makes such compromise. And while the gentleman was talking about the extreme measures that had been resorted to against the South my eye by chance fell upon members on the other side of the House by the score who were in the civil and military service of the ex-confederacy, and I recollected that over seventy-six ex-confederate officers were to be in the next Congress so nearly upon us. I suppose this is a part of the harsh treatment the gentleman speaks of.

I now desire to speak of the thirteenth section of the bill, or what is known as the habeas corpus section. There is no section of the bill that has been so persistently misrepresented on this floor and by a part of the press as this; and from the manner in which intelligent gentlemen on this floor have discussed this question, I am reluctantly compelled to believe that with many there is no desire to have it fairly discussed, but on the contrary to misrepresent its provisions, making a man of straw to suit themselves and then knock him over; however, as a matter of policy, I prefer the section should be modified for reasons which will appear as I progress.

It will be noticed that before, by this section, the writ of habeas corpus can be suspended the resistance to the Government must be organized and armed and so powerful as to be able by violence to overthrow and set at defiance the constituted authorities of both the State and United States in the State, or when the constituted authorities are in complicity with or shall connive at the unlawful purposes of such powerful and armed combinations, and by reason of the premises the conviction of offenders in the courts and the preservation of the public safety shall become impracticable. And more than this, the district in which such state of affairs may exist shall be described by proclamation by the President; and still more, before the writ can be suspended proclamation shall be issued commanding such insurgents to disperse. Gentlemen say that under this power the President may suspend the writ whenever he chooses. This is not so, for by the very terms of the act the civil arm of the Government must be powerless before he can suspend the operation of the writ; and if the President should see proper to arbitrarily suspend the writ when the act does not authorize it, he would be liable to impeachment and removal from office. As well say, because the President is the highest executive officer in the Government and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, that he will use these powers to subvert the Government. In either case he might make the effort, but the power to impeach and remove from office by the House of Representatives and Senate exists under the same Constitution and laws that creates the Executive, and he is not more liable to attempt to disregard the law and Constitution in the one instance than in the other.

A lawyer by profession, I have some knowledge of the history of the writ of habeas corpus, and presume I am inclined to take a sufficiently conservative view of this and perhaps other questions; but I will remind gentlemen the very object of the writ is to secure the personal liberty of the citizen, and when the state of society is such as contemplated by the bill under discussion, then the use of the writ, instead of being the ally of personal liberty, becomes the ally of force, violence, and rebellion in their efforts to override and destroy the rights of the citizen. But gentlemen say, Why give the President this power to suspend the writ when in all the Northern States, and a portion probably of the Southern States, there is not now nor is there likely to be a state of society calling for its use? Or, in other words, there should not be legislation of this kind unless there is some present or threatened danger near at hand calling for its use. So far as the Northern States are concerned such present or threatened danger does not exist, and I am perfectly willing, in fact, would prefer, that the section should be modified so as to apply to a part of the Southern States, and for a limited time only, and that, too, where such danger is shown by actual investigation of this House.

As there are many valuable provisions in this bill other than the thirteenth section and some gentlemen have indicated to me a desire to vote upon an amendment to strike out the thirteenth section, I have offered an amendment to that effect, but will vote for the substitution for my amendment of that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] as he tells me he will modify it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] which is to make the section apply only to the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama and to be in force only until the close of the next Congress; and I believe the section so modified ought to pass, and I shall vote for it. And there is great propriety in making it apply to those four States; for while as bad a state of affairs may exist in other Southern States as in these, yet this House has by the testimony taken by four special committees and their reports become informed that the state of facts does exist in those States calling for this legislation.

Before I pass from this subject I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the proposed section is more restricted in its provisions than a similar section of law that was approved April 20, 1871, (section 4,) for the purpose of suppressing the Ku-Klux organizations in the States lately in rebellion, under which I believe the writ of habeas corpus was only suspended in two counties, and which for the time being give peace to almost the whole South. I also call attention that the section adopts the second section of the act of March 3, 1863, requiring prisoners to be turned over to the United States courts and if not indicted at the first term after their arrest then to be discharged.

Gentlemen on the other side say, however, why not leave this legislation to the next Congress? I will tell them, among others, for the reason that the House of Representatives in the next Congress is composed of many men, enough to make a majority, who the history of the last fourteen years shows will not favor legislation to secure the equality of all before the law, many of whom from the North the records of this House show to have done all they dared do to embarrass the United States in putting down the rebellion, and many of whom from the South sought the life of the nation by war, and nearly all of whom, both from the North and South, have made war on reconstruction, upon the adoption of the constitutional amendments, and from time to time have opposed all legislation to insure a free ballot; who in 1871 first denied the existence of the Ku-Klux and their outrages, and if possible more bitterly denounced the Ku-Klux act than they do this proposed legislation; who have for ten years from time to time ignored, apologized for, or defended ostracism, proscription, riot, murder, and assassination; and who can only hope to get into power and control the United States by a united South, which is only possible by a reign of terror in many parts of the South, under which a free ballot cannot be had.

Who believes for an instant that under these circumstances any legislation would be had by the next Congress? But we are told that it is useless to pass this bill in the House, as it is so near the end of the session that it cannot be passed in the Senate on account of dilatory motions in that body that would be made to postpone it. I do not know how this may be. If the bill should fail in that way the fault will not be ours, the responsibility will not be on us. I believe the proposed law will give peace and protection to citizens throughout the country, and without it I believe violence and bloodshed will run riot in many portions of the South.

In conclusion, I want to say in all kindness to gentlemen, North and South, that in my opinion there neither can nor ought to be peace and prosperity until all citizens, as a rule, wherever they may be throughout the Union, are equal before the law in fact as well as in theory. And let it be recollected that he who constrains suffrage by intimidation or otherwise, (the people being sovereign,) commits a crime in its consequences akin to treason, sapping the very foundation of the Government, injuring not only the elector intimidated but all the people of the Republic.

At the conclusion of his remarks,

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-eight minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I yield that time, then, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] I first yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have sought the floor for the purpose of examining, as well as I may in the few minutes allotted me, one or two propositions of law. I have desired by the amendment I have sent to the Clerk's desk to be voted on to limit the exercise of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus to those insurrectionary districts where armed and unlawful combinations exist too powerful to be controlled by the civil process, so that wherever in the Union such combinations shall be found, if it ever happens as it once happened in Massachusetts, where there was a combination too strong to be resisted by the civil power and then Massachusetts marched her troops in Shay's rebellion to put it down, then the writ shall be suspended. Indeed wherever troops march in battle array there the writ of habeas corpus is suspended ipso facto. Under the law of 1795, Washington was allowed to take all the militia of the United States and to put down the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania. The writ of habeas corpus was not suspended by act of law, but the very act of war suspended the writ and because of that very fact.

Who shall determine where that state of insurrection exists? That power must be reposed somewhere, and the Constitution and the habits of our people and the laws of our country have always reposed that discretion in the highest officer, the President of the United States, surrounded by his cabinet of advisers and charged with the execution of all laws.

I do not think this power of suspension of the writ of habeas corpus need be perpetual or as long as this law exists, while I do think the other provisions of the act should be perpetual, and therefore I have sent an amendment, section 14, which shall limit it precisely as our fathers limited power in Washington to call out the militia and Army of the United States, and that was for two years, and thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter. The two years were evidently taken as a limit because Congress can make an appropriation for the Army only for two years under the Constitution.

Now what is the purview of this bill? The first section provides it shall be a crime for two or more to invade a State for the purpose of overthrowing its governmental institutions. My learned colleague on the Judiciary Committee from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] has told us he does not think that is within the power of Congress under the Constitution. He admits it is the duty of the United States whenever a State government is attempted to be overturned by armed invasion from without the State, whether by citizens of other States or others, to use the whole power of the Army and Navy of the United States to protect that State in its government. Well, then, is it not equally within our potency to declare the act by which this invasion is organized a crime, so that men may be deterred by these penalties imposed and therefore from bringing about such a state of affairs as would require such interposition of the General Government? Cannot we say—I speak now to gentlemen on the other side—cannot we say an expedition like that of John Brown, for instance, to overthrow the government of Virginia, is a crime against the United States? Can expeditions be organized on the right bank of the Mississippi in collusion with the State authorities there for the purpose of invading a State on the left bank of the Mississippi, and is this whole country to remain powerless and see that expedition make head and arm itself without power to interfere by legislation with the inception? Cannot we provide by law that no such armed expedition, no such conspiracy against a State shall be organized; and if organized, is a crime?

That is the first section. The second section is, as I understand it, when there shall be an armed attempt by conspiracy within a State to make such armed overthrow of the government of a State, which we are bound to protect and guarantee shall not be done, shall be a crime. Cannot we do that? Is anybody's liberty interfered with by so doing? Is there any limitation upon the rights of the citizen in that? Has any citizen the right to do wrong? Has any citizen the right to conspire to overthrow a State?

Then passing by the third section, to which I have heard no objection, the fourth section provides that men shall not carry guns to vote with; that they shall not arm themselves to go to the polls, to the end there shall be a peaceable election. I do not understand why guns are required in order to vote. Nobody has to shoot his ballot into the ballot-box. Cannot we take away this means of intimidation? Cannot we say that this right of voting is a peaceful and not an armed right? Will anybody insist that men shall go to the polls with arms in their hands, inflame themselves with whisky and with passion, and then use those arms in riot and bloodshed? If it is done in Massachusetts, I want it stopped; if it is done anywhere else, I desire it stopped by being made an offense.

Then what is the other objection which my learned friend finds? He said by the fourth section we impose a duty upon State officers, and that under the doctrine of Briggs's case Congress cannot impose any duty on State officers.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman understood me to make any objection to the section prohibiting the carrying of fire-arms at elections he is mistaken.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have passed that section and did not so understand the gentleman. I am now dealing with your objection that we cannot compel State officers to do any duty and impose penalties upon them if they fail to do it. A strictly State duty we cannot impose. But our Constitution foresees and provides for complex duties. The Federal executive government and its representatives are determined by the registration and deposition of the votes by the voters in the several States cast under State law. Such are the requirements of our Constitution. This House can only have its existence by votes under State laws by the Federal laws; and anything that affects the constitution of the House of Representatives of the United States is thus made therefore not only a State duty but a Federal duty, which a given man designated by State laws is to perform as well to his State as to the nation and as well to the nation as to the State. And therefore in that regard, when the State officer is registering the voters who shall determine the complexion and composition, the organization and members, of the House of Representatives of the United States—when he is doing that United States duty I claim the United States Government has power under the Constitution to regulate acts in that behalf and to keep him to his duty in doing that Federal duty which by accepting the State office which has this duty imposed upon it.

That is why I support the fourth section. I am, for want of time, only stating propositions rather than arguing them; and I propose to do it without any emotion, for I feel none on this subject. These are pure questions of constitutional law.

We now come to the section suspending the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Before the gentleman passes to that, let me ask him a question to relieve a legal difficulty in my mind.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If you will be short about it, as I have so little time.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Do not the first and second sections cover every possible overt act of treason? And does not the seventh section deprive the State courts of jurisdiction in cases of treason against the State government? Are we not undermining the criminal jurisdiction of the State courts?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means. In the first place I deny that there is any treason against one State by the citizens of another State going into it with armed forces to overturn it.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. But suppose they are citizens of the same State.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am speaking now to the first section. One at a time. I shoot with a rifle, not with a blunderbuss.

The first section says that it shall be a crime for citizens of one State to enter another State with intent to invade that State. Those citizens of the other State owe no allegiance to the State they invade. John Brown owed no allegiance to Virginia when he invaded it. There was there no treason, no traitor, no betrayal. If a foreigner comes in in time of peace and resides in a State, he takes upon himself local allegiance; then he is bound as other men to allegiance to the State he inhabits. But if he attacks a State with arms in his hands, it may be murder if he shoots anybody, or a violation of other State laws, but it is not treason.

Now for the second section. The second section provides for the case of a conspiracy of men within the State to overthrow the republican government of the State. But there are two kinds of jurisdiction for the breach of this Federal duty as a federal citizen, which the Constitution of the country imposed upon the United States Government to protect the State in that form of government. The offender may, if the law be so enacted, be punished in the United States courts for his breach of duty to the United States. For his breach of duty to the State under its laws he is to be punished under the laws of the State. And this is no new legislation.

Take the counterfeiting of the coin of the realm. That is both a crime against the United States and a crime against the State; and the State punishes the offender exclusively when it first gets hold of the criminal, and the United States punishes the offender exclusively when it first gets hold of the criminal; and he cannot be twice punished for the same act, because the provision of the Constitution against double punishment comes in.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The State courts have no jurisdiction to punish counterfeiting the coin or bank-notes, except it be given by express statute.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The law against counterfeiting United States bank-notes covers every case of counterfeiting bank-notes.

The United States has exclusive jurisdiction when they choose to exercise it, but the courts of every State in the Union furnish the same thing under State laws, and they have exclusive jurisdiction of the case when they get hold of the criminal.

But, sir, I must pass on, for I have but eight minutes. I must come now to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Allow me to ask the gentleman one thing more. I do not understand that the State courts assume jurisdiction for the counterfeiting of United States notes or its coin except where given by statute of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O! my dear sir; instead of interrogating me go and read the statute laws of some one of the States.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. That is not the law in regard to bullion and coin.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is the law in regard to bullion and coin, and more than that, in regard to Spanish dollars. Go and read the statute-book of any State and you will find it so; everybody knows that. I have defended men and prosecuted them both under State statutes and under the statutes of the United States for having counterfeit United States coin in possession with intent to defraud. We ought not to be here now discussing elementary principles of law.

Now in reference to the writ of habeas corpus. What is the effect of suspending the writ of habeas corpus? I will tell you what the effect is. It is not when the writ is suspended every man must be tried by a military commission or court-martial. My colleague, [Mr. PIERCE,] to whom I listened with great care in his maiden speech, as I always do listen to maiden speeches to see what there is in the men who make them, undertook to tell us that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus allowed every citizen to be tried by court-martial. Pardon me; a court-martial tries no civilian, although they may be tried by military commission under certain specified circumstances. A court-martial tries no civilian except under a special act of Congress against contractors for military goods; but the effect of the suspension of the writ is that wherever a man is arrested by a military officer or soldier, and while the prisoner is so held for the purpose of being brought before the United States court so that the United States court can get hold of him, no judge shall issue a writ of habeas corpus and take him out of the custody of that officer or soldier, who is not holding him to punish him himself, but to bring him to the United States court for punishment. That is the effect of the suspension of the writ; and I will tell you the necessity for it, which comes more from this cause than from anything else. If a military officer arrests a man, he, if he is true to his duty, will hold him at all hazards. Now, if a State court, when a military officer has arrested a man, issues a writ of habeas corpus to take that man out of his hands, the State or civil officer who serves the writ may take the posse comitatus with him to carry out his rescue. That military officer will resist, and then comes a conflict; and it is to prevent that class of conflicts that this provision for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus is desirable, so that all conflicts of jurisdiction may be avoided in the insurgent States where actual war has not supervened. It is simply for the purpose of enabling the military officers to perform their duty and to prevent those conflicts which the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus by a court would bring on.

Mr. POLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will, because the gentleman was kind enough to allow me to ask him one.

Mr. POLAND. Was it not repeatedly decided and is it not now the settled doctrine that a State court has no jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus where a man is under arrest under United States laws?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By civil officers.

Mr. POLAND. Was it not repeatedly decided during the war that there was no jurisdiction in the State courts to discharge persons who had been wrongfully enlisted?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. While the writ of habeas corpus was suspended.

Mr. POLAND. But it was in States where the writ of habeas corpus was not suspended.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Where was that?

Mr. POLAND. Was it suspended anywhere in New England?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; and in Maryland, which was a loyal State.

Mr. POLAND. I had occasion, occupying at the time a judicial position, to have several cases brought before me where men had been improperly enlisted, and I became satisfied that I had no jurisdiction in the matter, and not upon the ground of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That stands upon an entirely different principle. I am sorry my friend did not carry his judicial investigation far enough to ascertain that.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had thirty-eight minutes; and the Chair has divided it precisely in the middle.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am obliged to the gentleman for his courtesy. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] will see that his cases rested upon the ground of a contract. The enlisted man had signed the Rules and Articles of War. To-day you would hold such a man as an officer or soldier of the United States; not as a civilian arrested by an officer of the United States; that applies to an entirely different condition of things. All these things are plain and easy if you will only look at them without emotion in the clear light and logic of the law.

I want to say again that the great advantage of suspending the writ of habeas corpus is that it allows the military officer, when he arrests a man that rides at night, to take him to the marshal and have a complaint made against him and hold him until he can get him before the court.

One word more, and I will pass from this discussion, and perhaps forever. I sat here, at the risk of my health and life, twenty-odd hours, through the long watches of the night, fighting to bring this bill before the House for consideration against the filibustering motions of the other side, believing it to be my duty so to do. There were men of the republican majority who chose to go to their beds and take their rest. They now come in here and are very anxious that this debate shall be continued and of extending the time for debate to the factious minority.

At midnight we lost an opportunity of getting on with the bill because we wanted one of a quorum. The gentlemen on the other side, as they had the power to do—and I do not blame them for the exercise of that power—refused to vote, and so broke up a quorum and postponed the bill twelve hours. But what shall we say of the republicans who were in their beds, or at dinner, or frolicking somewhere, while we were wearing out our lives in order to meet this great exigency of the country? They are now very anxious to go on with this debate in the last hours of the session. Not only are they anxious to have the debate for themselves, but that our filibustering friends on the other side shall have ample time to debate. If the minority had only debated the bill through that twenty hours, they would have talked themselves out entirely; they would have had full opportunity for debate. That is why I think it best to be not overcourteous to them in that regard just now. I observe that all the courtesy comes from gentlemen who were at home sleeping with their wives at night while I was here with the true men standing to our duty.

Now let me tell those gentleman that if by their conduct they have allowed the minority to stave off this bill so that it is too late to pass it at this session, when they shall hear of a church burned, or a man being murdered at the South, and shall see his widowed wife and orphaned children——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I insist upon order being maintained. We cannot hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen standing in the aisles will please resume their seats.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope this does not come out of my time.

After a pause,

The SPEAKER said: The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When they hear the shriek of "murder" and see the widowed wife and orphaned children coming north, fleeing from the white-leaguers and Ku-Klux raiders, I trust their sleep will be as sweet as it was on that night when I was standing here for the safety of these poor creatures, at the risk of health, and they were at home sweetly sleeping. When they hereafter meet a widow of some murdered soldier from the South who asks for alms, do not send them to me, but let them give all that is necessary to sustain that poor creature themselves. Let each one of them say to that starving widow, "I am sorry that I did not stand up and defend you by the passage of a proper law; I am responsible; you need not trouble General BUTLER; he did sit up, and he has got to pay his physicians' bills and I have not, and I will take care of you."

And hereafter, Mr. Speaker, when you meet in Augusta, Maine, or in some other beautiful town in that State some poor, wretched refugee who went down South with his knapsack on his back and remained there—a carpet-bagger, if you please—until he was driven out for want of a law to protect, and he complains that you did not pass the law, tell him that parliamentary law required you to allow the democratic minority to control us, the republican majority, for hours, so that the golden opportunity was lost; that you were sorry for it; and be very sure to say at the same time, "What can I do to relieve you?" You never will forget to do that, I am sure.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, the question of life and death for hundreds of true men, black and white; the question of good government, anarchy, of peace or war, in my judgment, is to be decided now and here by our votes. Let us have no delay.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball;

An act (S. No. 459) for the relief of William D. Patton; and

An act (S. No. 674) to relieve D. C. Anderson of political disabilities.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4838) to declare the true intent and meaning of the twentieth section of an act passed by the Legislature of Dakota, passed January 14, 1875, entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance;" and

An act (H. R. No. 4841) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the security of elections, &c.

Mr. CANNON. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in the limited time allotted to members in this debate I hardly know how to approach a subject which all will recognize as one of the most important that has come before this Congress. There is no disguising the fact, that in its consideration we have all experienced feelings of anxiety, hesitation, and doubt. But we cannot escape action upon it if we would. It stands before us and we must dispose of it. We are at the parting of the way; we must proceed along one road or the other. The one we take here to-day may lead up to prosperity and peace, and it may lead down to disaster and ruin. For one sir, whatever may be the result, or whatever the consequences to myself personally or politically, I shall give the benefit of the doubt to the side of humanity, to the cause of the downtrodden and oppressed, to the staying of red-handed outrage, to the vindication of law, to the preservation of peace, to the building up of self-reliant manhood, and to the full protection of the humblest American citizen though he have his home in the remotest corner of the Republic. Sir, the government that does this, whatever may be its form or its name, attains the highest object for which governments are instituted among men; and the government which fails, or neglects to do this, I care not what its pretenses may be, falls short of the very object and end for which all human governments exist.

Mr. Speaker, we have never yet had, and we shall not have in this country a government which even begins to realize the object for which ours was ordained, namely, "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," until the citizens of each State and of all the States can pass freely to and fro, select their domiciles where they will and avow their sentiments as they please, unawed by the assassin's knife and unterrified by the rifle or revolver which sends the deadly bullet crashing through their houses in the night-time, and fills the air with shrieks of horror and distress. But what "justice" is that where law is defied, where courts are overthrown, where judges are sent fleeing for their lives under the cover of night? And what "domestic tranquillity" is "insured" where unarmed and defenseless men can be shot down on their own door-sills, and the missiles of death sent whistling through the beds of sleeping children? And what "blessings of liberty" are secured where men are hunted like wild beasts to the canebrake; their houses robbed; their wives and children terrified; their fields laid waste; their cattle, horses, and mules driven off, and no offender brought to justice, and no attempt made to restore to them the property of which they have thus been despoiled? Sir, a government which permits these things to be done, and to continue, without furnishing a remedy for their correction, not only fails in the highest functions of government, but to these poor victims it becomes a mockery and a curse.

But what amount of power shall be exerted to guarantee to all the blessings of republican government? I answer, Let the power be measured by the full protection of the citizen, and let him not suffer by the fact that he stands under the flag of his native soil rather than in a foreign land. Sir, the legal aspects of this bill have been so clearly and cogently presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and others that I have no desire to pursue that line of discussion even if I possessed the ability and had the time to do so. I simply desire to call attention to a few extracts from the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Louisiana

Slaughter-house cases, 10 Wallace, showing the object for which the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth constitutional amendments were adopted and indicating the source from which Congress derives the power to protect the colored man in his newly acquired rights. The court say:

> The most cursory glance at these articles discloses a unity of purpose when taken in connection with the history of the times which cannot fail to have an important bearing on any question of doubt concerning their true meaning.

Speaking of the thirteenth amendment they say:

> The word servitude is of larger meaning than slavery, as the latter is popularly understood in this country, and the obvious purpose was to forbid all shades and conditions of African slavery!

Passing on to the fourteenth amendment the court say:

> Among the first acts of legislation adopted by several of the States in the legislative bodies which claimed to be in their normal relations with the Federal Government were laws which imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens. * * * * * * *
> They were in some States forbidden to appear in the towns in any other character than menial servants. They were required to reside on and cultivate the soil without the right to purchase or own it. They were excluded from many occupations of gain, and were not permitted to give testimony in the courts in any case where a white man was a party. It was said that their lives were at the mercy of bad men either because the laws for their protection were insufficient or were not enforced.

The court, after saying that the gentlemen who had conducted the Federal Government safely through the crisis of the rebellion, being convinced that constitutional protection was necessary for this unfortunate race, proceeds:

> They accordingly passed through Congress the proposition for the fourteenth amendment, and they declined to treat as restored to their full participation in the Government of the Union the States which had been in insurrection until they ratified that article by a final vote of their legislative bodies.
> * * * * * * *

A few years' experience satisfied thoughtful men who had been the authors of the two amendments that notwithstanding the restraints of those articles on the States, and the laws passed under the additional powers granted to Congress, these were inadequate for the protection of life, liberty, and property, without which the freedom of the slave was no boon. They were in all these States denied the right of suffrage. The laws were administered by the white man alone. It was urged that a race of men distinctly marked, as was the negro, being in the midst of another and a dominant race, could never be fully secured in their persons and their property without the right of suffrage. Hence the fifteenth amendment, which declares that—

> The right of a citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The negro having by the fourteenth amendment been declared to be a citizen of the United States, is thus made a voter in any State of the United States of the Union.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that the thirteenth amendment emancipated the slave, but virtually left him an outlaw; the fourteenth amendment clothed him with citizenship; and the fifteenth gave him the right of suffrage. The three combined raised him to the dignity of a man, and invested him with the rights, the privileges, and immunities of a citizen. The court say:

> On the most casual examination of the language of these amendments no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been suggested. We mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly made freeman and citizen from the oppression of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him.
> We do not say that any one else cannot share in this protection; * * * but what we do say, and what we wish to be understood, is, that in any fair and just construction of any section or phrase of these amendments it is necessary to look at the purpose which we have said was the pervading spirit of them all, the evil which they were designed to remedy, and the process of continued addition to the Constitution until that purpose was supposed to be accomplished as far as constitutional law can accomplish it.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we are brought face to face with our duty to protect by every constitutional means this class of citizens; and the only question here to-day is, will we perform this duty or will we shirk it? Will we protect these men or will we leave them to be overborne and butchered? That, sir, is all there is of it. If we will not or cannot protect them, then let us say so. Let us admit that our system of government breaks down at this vital point; but let us prate no more about the "equal protection" of all men under the law; let us talk no longer of the glories of free institutions if, under them, unoffending citizens can be more cruelly persecuted than in Austria or Russia.

This bill seeks to guard more effectually the purity of the ballot-box. If protection cannot be afforded in this way, how can it be? If the sacred right of choice through the ballot-box may be ruthlessly trampled under foot, what vestige of free government remains in this country that is worth preserving? Sir, I have heard much said about the sacredness of constitutions and the danger of familiarizing the minds of the people with the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus upon slight pretext of danger, and I have felt the force of all this; but back of all constitutions, back of the great writ of personal liberty, back of free institutions themselves, stands this sacred right of the citizen to the free, unfettered expression of his choice at the ballot-box. This is of the essence of things; these others its form and product. Tamper with this, and you poison the stream at its source. A mob cannot get up a republican government. Any schemer can draught a constitution republican in form, but until the will of the people has breathed upon it, there is no life in it; and to give it vital force, that will must be free, not expressed under intimidation, force, or fraud; so free, that not only will the boldest feel secure, but the timid realize that he is protected in the free declaration of his choice.

Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, if I say I think it is not so much the familiarizing of the minds of the people of this country with the fact that the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended in order that violence, robbery, and murder shall be put down as it is the lesson so rapidly being taught them that men may tamper with the ballot-box, intimidate the voter, mutilate and forge returns, and "count in" their men regardless of the choice of the electors, and if by any means he shall procure a certificate of election, his party friends will sustain him, no matter how accursed the processes by which he attained his end. It is this which is sapping the foundations of representative government in this country. I do not say that a de facto State government irregularly established and sustained more or less by force or fraud may not sometimes be recognized as a necessity or in the interest of peace, especially where the power of the General Government to interfere is doubtful; but I do say that whenever this occurs there is a triumph of the mob spirit and a direct invitation to a repetition of the offense, the frequent recurrence of which is only necessary to unsettle the whole constitutional Government. It is to remedy these things and to throw around the ballot-box additional guards and guarantees that the present bill has been proposed and brought forward. As to the necessity of its passage or the fact of the existence of intimidation, outrage, and violence in the South, there is and there can be doubt. That the better class of southern people either instigate or approve of these atrocities I neither assert nor believe; on the contrary, I am well convinced that in many instances they deplore them. But such is their firm belief in the natural inferiority of the negro and his unfitness to participate in public affairs, and such their accustomed habit of exacting from him instant and unquestioning obedience, that whenever he asserts the right, assumes the dignity, or exhibits the pride and spirit of a man, he arouses within them the hottest resentment, and they seem possessed only of the desire either to rule him or rid themselves of his presence. Let him dare to oppose force to force, and the feeling which was before held in restraint now rises to a fury.

I have said, sir, that the better class of southern people neither instigate nor approve of these acts of cruelty; and I reiterate it. But are they any the less responsible? Let them say the mere word, and from that hour these outrages would cease. Suppose the case reversed, and these same atrocities were being perpetrated by the blacks upon the whites of the South. How long would it be before the country would be aflame, before United States troops would, if need be, garrison every town and hamlet of the South, and do it, too, not only with the approval but by the direct request of the people of the North? Is this an inconsistency? Ah, sir, it is not the first inconsistency which has burrowed itself in this painful subject. But what are these outrages, and what the evidence of their existence, or of the necessity for the passage of this bill? Sir, could twelve of the witnesses who testified before your investigating committee at Vicksburgh stand there at the Clerk's desk and tell their plain but terrible story in the presence of this House, I should be quite content to submit the question of fact to a silent vote. We can indeed reproduce their words; but mortal man can never reproduce here or elsewhere the sad, submissive, but uncomplaining manner in which they testified. To the honor of human nature be it said that the roughest spirits present were awed for the moment by the ghastly story of their wrongs, while the better class of citizens were not less horrified than the members of the committee themselves. As these poor creatures cannot speak in person here, let some of them speak from the printed pages of the testimony:

MATILDA FURMAN (colored) sworn.

Question. Was your husband killed in Vicksburgh?
Answer. Yes, sir; on Cherry street.
Q. When?
A. On Monday—on the Monday we had a fuss here.
Q. Have you any family?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Any children?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many?
A. Four of us. Of the family, my husband had one child of his own, and his step-child by his other wife. That was before he lived with me.
Q. Have you any chilren of your own?
A. I have, sir.
Q. And you have all the family together now, his children and your children?
A. Yes, sir; all together.
Q. They were living with you when he was killed?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When was he killed?
A. On the Monday that they had the fuss here in town.
Q. Did you see him killed?
A. No, sir; I didn't.
Q. Where did you find him when he was killed?
A. I found him out on Cherry street, just beyond a colored lady's by the name of Mrs. Campbell.
Q. Had he been shot?
A. Yes, sir; he was shot.
Q. How many balls—more than one?
A. I do not know.
Q. Where was he shot?
A. In through here, [indicating.]
Q. Right through his waist?
A. Yes, sir.

Q. He was dead when you found him?
A. Yes, sir; he was dead when I found him.
Q. Was he in the fight himself that day?
A. No, sir; he had no arms at all.
Q. Did you leave home with him at the time he was shot?
A. I left home with him. He went to get some money.
Q. How far did you go with him?
A. I live on Magnolia street, and I went down until we got in Cherry street, and then I started after my washing, and he started to go in another direction to get his money. Soon after this I was told that my husband was shot, lying up there on Cherry street, dead. And I walked up a piece. They told me to "go to Crosby and Ames for that political carcass."
Q. Who told you that?
A. I don't know who it was. It was a white man.
Q. Did they mean your husband?
A. I had then got to him, and was lying down on him.
Q. It was while you were down by your husband that they told you to go to Ames and Crosby for the political carcass?
A. Yes, sir; right there by him; and they were white men that I seen in town, though I didn't know them. I asked them to please help me.
Q. What did you want to do?
A. My husband was there, and I wanted him taken home. It was all that I could do.

AMBROSE BROWN (colored) sworn and examined.

Question. What is your name?
Answer. Ambrose Brown.
Q. How old are you?
A. I do not know, sir.
Q. How old do they call you?
A. About fifty-two or fifty-three; I have got my age at home.
Q. Do you live here in Vicksburgh?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where?
A. Just a little below Mr. John A. Klein's house, in his bottom there.
Q. What do you do for a living?
A. Running a dray and farming in the summer.
Q. Were you in the city on that Monday when that trouble occurred?
A. Yes, sir; I walked up on the corner of South and Washington streets at the time of the ringing of the bells.
Q. Did you have any trouble that day?
A. Yes, sir; I did.
Q. Tell us all about it.
A. When I got up there on the corner of South and Washington streets, opposite Doctor O'Leary's drug store, Captain Cowan came riding up. Says he, "You God damned son of a bitch, get off this pavement. If you don't, I will blow the top of your head off." Says I, "Captain, I don't see no harm to walk on the pavement." He drew his pistol—bang!—and that quick shot me; and I never opened my mouth except to say what I did. I was sort of staggered, and another man standing opposite of me when he shot me, named Bill Vick, grabbed me by the arm and took me home. By the time I got home my shoe was full of blood as it could be.
Q. Where were you shot?
A. I was shot on the left shoulder.
Q. Was Captain Cowan on horseback?
A. Yes, sir. I did not believe he would shoot. I knew enough not to sass him, and did not do it.
Q. Who was with you at that time?
A. William Vick.
Q. Is he a colored man or white man?
A. A colored man.
Q. And he took you home?
A. Yes, sir. * * * The minute that I replied back to him that I did not know it was any harm to walk on the pavement, he out with his pistol and went—bang! I don't see how he missed Bill.
Q. Did the shot go through your shoulder?
A. O, no, sir; the ball is in there now—right in here, under the collar-bone. I sent for a doctor. It was some two or three days before I could get any doctor; and, in fact, I could not get any until I sent to young Mr. Doler to come. He went and got Doctor Hunt; and he probed for the ball; but it had been there so long he said it was not worth while to try to get it out. And he could not get it without cutting the arteries, there, close to the backbone; and it might cut some of the arteries of the neck. And he advised me not to let any one else try it.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the words of this old man can be reproduced here; but the pensive look and quivering voice with which he told his simple story cannot be reproduced. He was not arrested, as he might have been had he been showing resistance. He was scarcely warned, but was shot down in an instant. A defenseless old man shot like a dog in the streets and miles away from any actual conflict. Ah, sir, life is cheap! too cheap in some parts of the South.

EMILY BOYD (colored) sworn and examined.

Question. Is your name Emily Boyd?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Are you married?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where do you live?
A. I live out on the place that they call Cook's place, out the Jackson road. It sets off from the Jackson road.
Q. How far from the town?
A. About eight miles.
Q. Is your husband living?
A. No, sir.
Q. When did you know of his death?
A. That Monday.
Q. When the trouble was here?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At what time did he leave home?
A. He left in the morning with the rest of the colored men who were coming in town.
Q. Now just tell me who, if you know who, was it that brought that party into town. Who was the leading man among you folks out there?
A. I do not know, sir. We heard of it at church. It was given out at Freetown church on Sunday that the men were all to meet here on that Monday to salivate Peter Crosby in his seat.
Q. You mean to help him?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did your husband go along with them?
A. Yes, sir; he was with those men.
Q. At what time of the day did he leave home?
A. After breakfast.
Q. How many of them came?
A. I do not know how many on my place.
Q. When did you see him again?
A. I never saw him until Thursday. We came up on the road that morning and helped pack the men out of the hollows on Thursday.
Q. You came out after the men?
A. Yes, sir; we women packed them out of the hollows.
Q. How many dead men did you find down there?
A. I never seed but four, with my husband.
Q. Do you know who they were?
A. Mingo Green, Joe McGrant, and Wash. Tinsey.
Q. And your husband?
A. Yes, sir; that made the four.
Q. Where was he hit?
A. He was hit through the hand, and then shot through here, [pointing to the breast.] And his mule we never got. We women took these four bodies back.
Q. Why didn't any men go with you from home?
A. They were in the woods; there didn't anybody come but we women; the men said they were afeared to come; and we women come and got them ourselves. We got them to dig the grave, and they put one of the men watching until they dug the grave.

Let it be remembered that for four days these bodies lay bloated and festering in the open country, near the public highway, and within four miles of the court-house at Vicksburgh.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Certainly, if it is not too long.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It will be very short. My friend lives in the county of Rock, one of the strongest republican counties of the State of Wisconsin. Does he remember the occasion when a man who had been tried by the courts there was taken from the custody of the sheriff and hanged to a tree right in the midst of that great moral and republican community?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I remember it well, although I was not there at the time; and I remember equally as well that the leading men of that city and of Rock County did their very best to prevent this outrage; that this was nineteen years ago, and nothing of the kind has recurred there since.

A MEMBER, (on the democratic side.) So do we try to prevent them.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. So do you! Yes, so you say. But if you denounce such outrages why can they not be stopped?

A MEMBER. They will be.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Thank Heaven for that. But I will proceed:

LOUISA BANKS (colored) sworn.

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. Out on Jackson road.
Q. How far out from the town?
A. Three and a half miles, I reckon, on Mr. Bay's place.
Q. Have any of your family been killed lately?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who has been killed?
A. My husband and son.
Q. Where?
A. Right out from my house.
Q. What day?
A. Monday.
Q. What time of the day?
A. I reckon between ten and eleven o'clock.
Q. How old was your son?
A. Eighteen years.
Q. Now tell us how that happened?
A. All I can say, a gentleman rode up to where my husband was standing right outside the door, and they told him to come out immediately, and he went out, and they asked where was his son, and he said in the house; he told him to call him out, and he called him out.
Q. What was done then?
A. We had a pistol there, and they asked for it; they struck at him with a gun and ran him back in the yard behind a hay-stack, and he ran down the hill, and they shot him.
Q. That was your husband?
A. No, my son; they had my husband holding the horses until they shot my son, and when they came back they made him tie the horses and told him to walk out, and ten or fifteen yards from my door they shot him.
Q. Who did this?
A. I do not know, sir.
Q. How many of them were there?
A. Five of them.
Q. Were they on horseback?
A. Three of them on horseback and two on mules.
Q. Do you know anything about a fight had there on Jackson road?
A. I heard them shooting up there, and that was all I know.
Q. Was this after that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Your husband and son were in your own house.
A. Yes, sir; in my own house.
Q. Had they been away that morning?
A. No, sir; my husband had not left home, for they said every man who staid at home attending to his business they would not hurt them.
Q. Had your son been out?
A. No, sir; not on the road, that I know of. We sent him down to cut some wood that morning, and when he heard such a fuss on the road shooting he came into the house, and his father told him to stay in the house and nobody would hurt him.
Q. You had heard somewhere that people who staid at home would not be hurt?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did they get off their horses when they came in?
A. Two of them got off and the other three staid on their horses.
Q. What was the first thing they said?
A. They just came up and hollered to my husband to "come out here," and said they were going to settle this thing that day.
Q. What did he say?
A. Never said anything, but went right up to them.
Q. What did they say to your son?
A. They asked him for the pistol, and they got the pistol up there in the house; it was lying up a loft; a white man reached up there and took it down.
Q. Then did they say anything else to your son?

A. No, sir.
Q. Where did he go?
A. He went on through the house. A man urged him on with a gun, and he ran through the house and he ran after him.
Q. Did the man go through the house, too?
A. He did, sir.
Q. How far from the house was he shot?
A. Just right out behind the house where he was shot at; then he ran down the hill about fifty yards.
Q. Was he shot at more than once?
A. Twice.
Q. Did the first shot hit him?
A. Hit him right in his back.
Q. Where did the second shot hit him?
A. Right in here, [indicating the breast.] He was lying flat on his back, and the hole was right in here.
Q. They shot him after he fell?
A. I suppose they did, by that.
Q. Did the men say anything after that?
A. Never said anything; only told us women to go into the house and shut the door.
Q. Was your husband holding the horses?
A. Yes, sir; while they were shooting his son; and then they made him tie the horses and told him to walk out.
Q. What was their language?
A. "You tie them horses and walk out here."
Q. How far did he walk from where he tied the horses?
A. About ten or fifteen yards.
Q. And then what did they do?
A. Nothing; but just shot him right down.
Q. More than one shot?
A. No, sir; one shot, right through his neck.
Q. What did they do then?
A. Jumped on their horses and told us to go into the house and shut the door.
Q. What did they do next?
A. Just came up the road.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. How much time have I left?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin know of anybody being punished there for such crimes?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Certainly not.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Let me state that at that time war was existing in the streets of Vicksburgh, brought on by the republican governor of the State of Mississippi, against the white men of that city, who stood in defense of their homes and their families and their most cherished interests.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Hold on, my friend, or there will be no time left for any of us. Let me ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] if eight days after, when three men were taken into a hollow, their brains knocked out, their throats cut, their ears cut off, their bodies left on the public roads to be further mutilated, if that was the state of war to which he refers, and if not, will he tell us, as he was on the committee, if anybody has been arrested for that outrage? When Buck Warrall, the next day after this Monday fight, miles away from the city, was driven from his own house by armed men and fled to Mr. Edwards, his employer, for protection, and was driven out by the female members of the family and shot dead at the door-yard gate in the presence of his frightened wife—was that the state of war to which my friend from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] refers?

Mr. O'BRIEN. You ask me a question; let me answer it. Will the gentleman give me an opportunity to answer the question he put to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. If the House would consent and it did not come out of my time, I should not object if you popped away at me all day, because these things are in the testimony; they are God's truth, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then if you will not, I will answer it when I obtain the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Now that I have more time than I thought I had, notwithstanding these interruptions, I will read from this volume of testimony which I hold in my hand, as these witnesses tell their story far more eloquently than I can. And if there be no objection, I will insert such portion in my remarks as I have not time to read. Now let us see about this man Warrall:

PEGGY WARRALL (colored) sworn.

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. On Mr. Edwards's plantation out in the country.
Q. How far from the city?
A. I do not know how many miles—eight miles.
Q. What road is it on?
A. On the Jackson road.
Q. Are you married?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is your husband's name?
A. His name is Buck Warrall.
Q. Where is he?
A. They killed him.
Q. Who killed him? Tell me about it.
A. He run up to the house, to some white folks' house, for them to defend him, and they had him took out of the yard and shot.
Q. What day was that?
A. On Tuesday.
Q. Did you see them when they shot him?
A. Yes, sir; he was standing right out there in the road.
Q. You saw them when they shot him?
A. Saw them when they shot him down.
Q. Who shot him?
A. Alex. Hebron shot him. I was looking right at him.
Q. What did he shoot him with?
A. Shot him with his gun.
Q. Did you hear them say anything to him?
A. They had been up there to the house asking for him, and they had him taken out of the yard and shot.
Q. What did they say when they shot him, or before they shot him?
A. I never heard what they said to him before they shot him.
Q. Where had he gone from when he went up to Edwards's?
A. He went from his house.
Q. What did he go to Edwards's house for?
A. For them to friend him; and they drove him out toward the road, and told them white fellows to take him out there, not to shoot him in the yard, but to take him outside the gate, and they didn't care what they did with him; and they just carried him outside the gate and shot him down; and he laid out there for two nights and two days, and the dogs ate his face and head all off before we women could bury him. There was nobody to bury him but the women, and we buried him the best way we could.

ALEXANDER HEBRON sworn.

Question. It has been sworn here in testimony that this man Warrall, running away from the pursuit of these men, entered Edwards's house, and was driven out by Martha Edwards, and that upon his being driven out of the house and out of the yard, you killed him with your shot-gun.
Answer. No, sir; I did not.
Q. Was he killed at that time, if at all?
A. No, sir.
Q. You have no knowledge about his being killed?
A. No, sir.
Q. What day was it that you were at Edwards's house?
A. On Tuesday.
Q. What time on Tuesday?
A. I don't know.
Q. About what time?
A. I have no idea. It was about noon or afternoon.
Q. Who were these men that you found there that had this man Buck Worrell?
A. There was Mr. Couch and Mr. Darden. There were several others, I think.
Q. Are there any others in that party that you know?
A. No, sir.
Q. You say they took this man out about three hundred yards?
A. They were about that distanece from the house when I left them.
B. While you were there he was not killed?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you hear shots before you got away?
A. I heard firing.
Q. Right there where you left them?
A. No, sir; I didn't hear firing where I left them.
Q. Was not the man killed?
A. They said he was.
Q. Who said he was?
A. I heard several of the company.
Q. That same party?
A. No, sir; I didn't hear the same party; I heard some men say so afterward; I just went around and came up back, and I heard several men say afterward that the man was killed.
Q. You don't know where he was killed except by information?
A. No, sir.
Q. Was it reported in your company that he was killed?
A. That is what I heard.

Will any one claim that this poor woman's story is not substantially true, or will it be pretended that this is a product of the "outrage-mill?"

ISAAC MOSELY (colored) sworn.

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. I lives out beyond—you may say between the two roads—between the Benton road and the Milldale road.
Q. How far from town?
A. About nine miles
Q. How old are you, do you suppose?
A. I am said to be fifty.
Q. How long have you lived there?
A. This coming May, thirty-three years.
Q. How long have you lived in the county?
A. Ever since 1844; ever since I came to this country.
Q. Do you know of the killing of any black men?
A. I never seen none.
Q. Do you know of any found killed?
A. Yes, sir; Joe Cook, out beyond by Banks's, and George Shepard, and Emanuel Tooles, who lived on Mrs. Widow Black's land. George Shepard, he lives on Bill Wadleigh's place, about a mile and a half from here.
Q. Did you see the dead bodies?
A. Yes, sir; I seed them.
Q. When did you see them first?
A. About a week before Christmas.
Q. Were these all colored men?
A. Yes, sir.

This was the week before Christmas; remember the "war" was the 7th of December; and these men were killed during that week, and buried the week before Christmas.

Q. You understood they were taken there to be killed?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know who took them there?
A. I will tell you; the man that sent for George Shepard, that was Captain Hogin. For at the time that they went to George Shepard's house George said to Mr. Harris, "What do you want of me; you are going to kill me?" He says, "O, no, George; I am not going to kill you; I just want you to tell me all about what you were doing on the Jackson road." And they took George Shepard there. Captain Wilmore, who lives on Oak Ridge, he came to my house hunting round on Sunday.
Q. Hunting arms?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The Sunday after the fight in Vicksburgh?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did he say?
A. I asked him his name, and he told me. I told him, "What are you going to do with George," and he said he was not going to do anything with him, only he wanted him to tell what he knew. "We are not going to kill him at all; I am going right back." And when I turned round they had went back and had taken George up to Mrs. Fox's and Mr. Burns's store, and they killed him. Bill Wadleigh went up there (he lived with Bill Wadleigh) and asked if they would turn him loose, and they said they would; and Captain Hogin, he went off; and Captain Reed went off; and Captain Alexander Hogin went off; and then the other men took George and carried him off and killed him. Captain Alexander Hogin went for him (George Shepard) in the night.

Q. You saw all these three men lying dead within about fifty yards of each other?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What day did you see them after that Sunday?
A. I saw them on Wednesday.
Q. What kind of a place were they in?
A. There was cane on one side of the road.
Q. Were they in the cane?
A. George Shepard was lying right in the road, and the others right on the side of the road.
Q. Next to the cane?
A. Yes, sir. Their wives had gone up there and got them taken up and buried.
Q. And you say you think they had been killed?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How?
A. George Shepard on this part of the head [indicating forehead] was shot off, and old man Joe Cook was shot through the neck and his throat was cut. Emanuel Tooles's throat was cut. George Shepard was shot through the head; his head was shot all to pieces.
Q. Was his brain coming out?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And Cook had his throat cut?
A. Yes, sir; he was shot, and then his throat was cut.
Q. Where was he shot?
A. Up near his neck here, [indicating.]
Q. How was the other one, Tooles, shot?
A. He was shot near about the same way, and his throat was cut, and then his ears were cut off; and Cook's ears were cut off. We had a terrible time of it out there. I could not stay in my house at night.
Q. You think that there are colored men hiding yet?
A. Yes, sir; they are afeard now to come home to their families. I heard them say—I ain't going to tell you nothing that I didn't hear—I heard them say these words myself, that they wanted to kill off all the colored men; then they would take the women and put them to work, and make them do what they pleased with them.
Q. Are the colored folks out where you live afraid to be at home after this?
A. No, sir; I don't know after this; but some of them did not come in Christmas, and if they come in they slip out nights, for the men did not stop riding down there.
Q. The men did not stop riding?
A. No, sir.
Q. Had not stopped riding until Christmas?
A. Yes, sir. I know I lived out in the country, up the road about two miles, and every night I could hear them going up by my house, and I was scared, and when I heard them coming my dog would bark, and I pulled up my floor, and I would roll out under the floor.
Q. You would go out through the floor?
A. Yes, sir; and go up in the hollow to the cane.

LUCINDA MITCHELL (colored woman) sworn.

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. Out on Fort Hill here, next to Mr. Chappel's place?
Q. In the city here?
A. Yes, sir; in the city.
Q. Did you live there at the time that this trouble was here in Vicksburgh, in December?
A. I have been living there three years the 3d of January.
Q. Did you know of any colored men killed in that neighborhood?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was it?
A. An old crazy man, Tom Bidderman.
Q. Did you see it?
A. I saw it.
Q. Tell me what you saw?
A. I saw them kill him. When they rode up to the gate the old man was sitting on the gallery; he goes and opens the door and goes out on the gallery, (stoop,) and then goes back in the house and shuts the door to. They opens the door and asks him if there was any guns inside. He said there was one. They says, "Then I want it;" and the old man said, "You can't have it; it is mine." And he shut the door. The white man says, "God damn you; I can break it down." He pushed the door open and shot him. The first shot went in his right side and the second right in his right shoulder; and the other load went in his head.
Q. At whose house was it?
A. Murray Thomas's.
Q. Was he a pretty old man?
A. Yes, sir; I have known him for six or seven years, and he always seemed to be crazy; and made his living hunting and fishing. He had a basket of squirrels sitting in the house for Mr. Thomas to sell next day for him.
Q. What time was this?
A. I don't recollect the day of the month. It was Tuesday night.
Q. What time in the night?
A. About nine o'clock.

MURRAY THOMAS (colored) sworn.

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. I live out here on the cemetery road; on the Yazoo Valley road.
Q. Inside of the town?
A. Inside of the corporation.
Q. The same place that this woman has been testifying to?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What do you know of a man named Bidderman being killed in your house?
A. Tom Bidderman was killed in my house.
Q. State what happened there that night. First, where did you go?
A. I was standing in the road, and I heard some shots fired up at my house, and I heard my wife holler, and one of the gentlemen who was there observed to me, "Where is that shooting? It is somebody shooting up there at your house." I says, "Gentlemen, it is no person shooting there except some of those men."
Q. When you came into the house did you see the old man?
A. Yes, sir; he was lying right down one side of the house.
Q. Was he inside of the house?
A. Yes, sir; he was inside of the house. The balls passed through into the other room, and came near killing my two children.
Q. In which room did you find the old man?
A. Into the first room; the front room.
Q. Where were your two children sleeping?
A. Just into the back room.
Q. Where did you say the ball had gone?
A. I do not know whether it was the first, or second, or the fourth; but one of the balls came that near the children, [indicating;] it went into the lower room, and went through the partition of the house, and over my children's bed, and went out again into the air.

* * * * * * *

Q. Were you a soldier in the United States Army?
A. Yes, sir; in the Fifty-second United States.

Sir, ours is the Government for which this poor man fought, and the above is the kind of protection which we give him in return. Let it be remembered that this was twenty-four hours after the fight; and that the perpetrators of this murder were no straggling desperadoes, but a band of sixty mounted men, officered and under command, filing up the street. If it be said that officers cannot always control the excesses of their men, then why have not these offenders been arraigned and punished under some law, civil or military? The answer is too obvious. The purpose is to strike terror deep into the hearts of the colored people and deter them from asserting their rights either as men or citizens; and while the better classes of whites would not advise these outrages, there is no public sentiment which demands their punishment.

NICEY HILLIARD (colored) sworn.

Question. Did you live in Vicksburgh at the time this trouble was here?
Answer. I lives out here about half a mile, as near as I can come at it, over the breastworks.
Q. Did you have a husband at that time?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you know of his being killed?
A. I found him dead.
Q. Had your husband been out in the fight that day?
A. No, sir.
Q. Was you at home that day?
A. No, sir; I was not at home; because when I saw the men coming I was scared, and he was there, and he said, "Nicey, take the children and go;" and he said the white people were shooting, and we could see it. I was sick and scared too I took my children and went away from the house, and I got about as far away as from here to Washington street, I reckon, and I saw Handy going to put the calf up. I said, "When you put the calf up, you come on, too." I kept going on and looking back, and I ain't seen him come yet.
Q. Did he have any gun or any kind of weapon?
A. No, sir; he did not have any arms, because he said he was going to get out of the way, and we were all scared. I was so scared I hardly knew what to do.
Q. He was trying to tie up the calf and then come to join you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You did not see him killed?
A. No, sir; I did not see him killed, but heard the guns when they went off; but I did not know it was him.
Q. Where did you go with the children?
A. We went a piece to the other side of my plantation.
Q. Into the woods?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long was you there?
A. We were not there very long before they got scarce and then we came out.
Q. And when you came out you found him?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where was he shot?
A. Just right here in his left breast. [indicating.]
Q. What was his name?
A. Handy.
Q. How many children have you?
A. Three children.
Q. When did you bury him?
A. I never got the chance to bury him until Wednesday. I had to come to town to get the paper, and did not get back until near night, and did not have time to do anything.
Q. Did you bring him in a wagon?
A. No, sir.
Q. What did you do?
A. He was so close to my house, I took him up to my house.
Q. Who got him to your house?
A. Two men.
Q. Two colored men?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You got him into the house that Monday night?
A. Yes, sir; it was after dark before I could get any one to take him up.

Sir, you may read again all the stories of pathos, whether found in prose or poetry, and whether you find it in the tender love and touching fidelity of the "Slave of Martinique," when—

> Sadly looks he, deeply sighs he; 'tis the Haytian sail he sees,
> Like a white cloud of the mountains, driven seaward by the breeze.

Or the angelic and devoted Evangeline, as—

> She pressed once more the lifeless head to her bosom;
> Meekly she bowed her own, and murmured,
> "Father, I thank thee!"

Or wherever it be, whether in legend, song, or story, you shall never see more pathos compressed into one sentence than you would have seen could you have beheld this poor, simple, ignorant woman as she described herself fleeing across the fields with her children, and heard her say:

I kept going on and looking back, and I ain't seen him come yet!

Mr. Speaker, this sad catalogue of wrongs might be continued, but I must not trespass further upon the time of the House for this purpose. I will cite only one or two other cases from the majority report of our committee:

A poor old man, Mingo Green, very old, and so decrepit that he was compelled to support his steps with a cane, a local exhorter of some note, chanced to meet a party of these patrols and was put to death and left lying in the road with the top of his head cut smooth off; or, as the witness expressed, "the whole inside of his head showed white like a china bowl."

The case of Anthony Mack deserves some notice. This man was charged with commanding the party that killed Vaughn. A warrant was issued for him; he was arrested in Yazoo County, and delivered to two men, one of whom was Hogan, to be brought to Vicksburgh for trial. On the way these worthy officers of the law killed their prisoner, but the place and manner of his death are not known.

From all the information before us, the committee find that in the whole affair two white men—Brown and Vaughn—appear to have been killed, and twenty-nine blacks, more than half of whom were deliberately put to death in cold blood. How many more are missing and unaccounted for, lying in the cane, it is impossible to ascertain. One of the witnesses stated that we (the committee) never could find out; "but we watch where the buzzards hover, and there we find the dead men."

So great had been the loss of order, and so unrestrained were the worst elements in Vicksburgh during the three days from the 7th to the 9th, that the best people of the city, the very men who had been original leaders in the movement, dreaded that violence would be offered to the judges both of the law and chancery courts, and made arrangements with Mr. Rigby, president of the railway, by which a special train was secretly prepared to start from the round-house nearly half a mile from the depot, to take these officers of the law out of the city and out of the power of the mob. Carriages were procured and the judges taken by back streets to the waiting train, put in cars carefully darkened, and sent off with instructions to engineer and conductor not to stop till they reached Jackson. Such was the state of affairs in Vicksburgh under the rule of the mob; such will be the case in any other place where law is overthrown and the violent rule of irresponsible men substituted for orderly government.

Sir, I have heard something here about the "bayonet submitting to the ermine." I think it would have required a pretty lively chase for the bayonet to have submitted to the ermine of that eventful night. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not cited these instances of cruelty to claim that the white people at Vicksburgh acted wholly without provocation. There are two sides to this question as to all others. That adventurers had foisted themselves upon the people, that taxes had been high, that some colored official had been corrupt in office, cannot be disputed. But the great mistake of all was in seizing upon Crosby, the sheriff, who was shown to have been guilty of no offense, and, with the courts open and unobstructed, with ample, legal, and peaceful remedies at hand, invoking the spirit of the mob and letting loose upon the negro population the fiercest passions of men.

Sir, it has been with a view to trace the working of these and the consequent terrors excited in the minds of colored people that I have alluded to this matter, rather than with any intention of entering upon a critical review of the general facts of this case, which would require far more time than I am permitted to occupy. It will readily be seen that, with this spirit of dread and apprehension in the air, with the habit of control which the white man possesses on the one hand and of submission on the part of the blacks on the other, it would not require the drawing of revolvers at the polls or around registration boards to intimidate colored voters. The men from whom you fear assassination or a deadly assault may never have drawn a weapon or uttered a threat. Yet if from some subtle cause you fear he may fire through your windows in the night or assail you from a dark alley, your dread of him is far greater than it would be to meet him in open combat.

Such I think is the feeling throughout the South, a sense of insecurity and dread on the part of the blacks well calculated to deter them from the free exercise of the elective franchise. The answer heard more frequent than any other from men when invited to come forward and tell all they knew was, "Well, we have to live here with our families." Now, sir, if these matters were confined to a single outbreak or to a single locality like that of Vicksburgh, they might be classed with those tumultuous uprisings to which all communities are subject. But when you place behind them the firm belief on the part of the white men of the South that the negro is unfit for self-government and utterly incapable of improvement, and add to this a fixed determination to control him at all hazards, and to this the further fact that this feeling is spreading all over the South, encouraged no doubt by the results of the recent elections, no man can doubt that if the negro is not to be utterly subdued and crushed out politically, every possible protection and support must be thrown around him. That the colored race are advancing in intelligence, the acquisition of property, and a knowledge of public affairs in this country is too plain for cavil. Mr. McGee, a native of the South, and a young man of culture and great force of character, testified before the committee on this point as follows:

Question. In your opinion, are the colored people of this county anxious to acquire a knowledge of the political affairs of the country?
Answer. Yes, sir; I think so.
Q. In your opinion do they try to learn their duty as citizens?
A. I believe they do; that is my impression.
Q. They have their bad teachers?
A. Sometimes; and they "whoop them up" terribly when they find it out.
Q. When they find out that they have bad doctrines, do they still follow them?
A. No, sir.
Q. As a class, do they ask and desire instruction?
A. I believe as a class they do; I believe that they are a progressive people.
Q. You think as a people they are growing more intelligent?
A. I do.
Q. Better fitted to perform the duties of citizens?
A. I believe the colored school-children will compare very favorably with the white school-children.
Q. Do they learn easily?
A. Very quickly.
Q. Have you ever known among the colored people, as a class, from any information you have ever received, any desire to form armed associations for any purpose "aggressive?"
A. I have not.
Q. Upon the rights of whites or anybody else?
A. No, sir; I have not.
Q. As far as you know, is that ever taught in their meetings?
A. I have never heard anything of the sort.
Q. You say you were born here?
A. I was, within fifty miles of this city.
Q. Are the colored people, as a class, better informed and more intelligent and better educated year by year since they were freed?
A. I think they are, sir; I think their advancement in civilization and education is remarkable.
Q. That is a fact generally conceded?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. From your own observation, are they, as a class, as a body of people, anxious for education and improvement?
A. Yes, sir; noticeably so.
Q. Do their children attend school generally and promptly?
A. They do, sir.
Q. And eagerly, I will add?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Are any of them accumulating property?
A. Yes, sir; I know a good many colored men who have bought land, a considerable amount, and made their money themselves; I could name quite a number.
Q. You stated that you knew most of the colored people who owned land in the county?
A. I believe I do.
Q. Name them.
A. I cannot say; perhaps the most of them. I know quite a number.
Q. Name all you can.
A. John Jones, William Jones, Cebron King, Elias Jones, David Jones, Henry Kent, Louis Kent, B. B. Lewis, George W. Boyd, Cæsar Hogan, Sandy Mitchell, W. T. Montgomery, B. T. Montgomery, Isaiah Montgomery; and that is about all I can think of at present. But I believe I could name a hundred others who own land in the city and land outside. Those are some of the largest that I have named. The men whom I have named own thousands of acres. Two I named, perhaps, own more land than anybody else in the county.

But I must pursue this subject no further. Gentlemen of the South, it remains for you to determine what the result of all this shall be. I have stood but twice upon your soil. I have met many of you in the political and social walks of life in this city, and I joyfully bear testimony to your generous hospitality and your genial ways. But upon you, and you alone, rests the fearful responsibility of saying whether these outrages shall continue or whether they shall cease altogether; whether peace shall in fact dawn upon this country or whether war with all its woes shall afflict it again. Reactionary measures cannot help you. This is a young and vigorous Republic; it will take no step backward. You might as well attempt to gather up the blood spilled upon the ground in our late strife as seek to reunite the scattered fragments of the old order of things. Shattered as by the hand of Omnipotence, nothing short of Omnipotence can ever restore it again. Your millions of people, advancing in intelligence, progressing in influence, gathering to themselves landed property, enjoying the sympathies of the civilized world, and aspiring to the full dignity, rank, and power of American citizens, are not going to step down to any lower level. Neither are the American people going to consent that they shall.

Gentlemen, if you do not indorse this spirit of violence and outrage in the South—and we cannot believe that you do, and we do not charge that you do—why is it that you do not rise up in the full majesty of that chivalric spirit which has ever been accorded to you and say, "These things shall be so no more?" Let the leading men of the South do this, and these outrages cannot survive a single day. Let them determine that these disorders shall cease; let them give the colored man a fair chance in the race of life; let them encourage him in acquiring property and protect him in its enjoyment; let all men be secure in the full and free avowal of their sentiments, whether religious or political; let the large landed estates be divided into such tracts as can be most profitably cultivated; let capital feel that its home is in the South, and that its possessor shall be neither socially nor politically ostracized—in short, gentlemen, let every energy be put forth to develop and build up the better rather than the baser elements of human nature, and we will then shake hands, not across a "bloody chasm," but across a country teeming with life, filled with the blessings of peace, and crowned with a prosperity such as no other land has ever seen beneath the sun. Grant us this, and we will consent that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus may be dispensed with forevermore.

Mr. DAWES took the floor.

Mr. COBURN. I gave notice I should at this time call the previous question, and I now rise for that purpose. I have no objection to the continuance of this debate.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. COBURN. Wait a moment until I can explain. I am urged by gentlemen all round to demand the previous question in view of the shortness of the session. A while ago, when interrupted by the Speaker, I intended to say I was willing the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] should have some time if the same time were allowed to gentlemen on the other side, but that I would not take the responsibility of passing by the expiration of the hour of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] because there is such urgency and such lack of time.

Mr. SHANKS. Let us have the question.

Mr. COBURN. The Arkansas and Louisiana questions are still pending, two appropriation bills still remain, with an enormous amount of other business, and on this question of Louisiana and Arkansas there may be ample opportunity for the gentleman from Mississippi and gentlemen on all sides to make such remarks as they may desire. Therefore, in view of the condition of things in this House, I feel it my bounden duty now, at the expiration of the hour of the gentleman from Illinois, to demand the previous question.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Is the gentleman from Indiana willing to consent to a separate vote on the first and second sections.

Mr. COBURN. I am willing to allow his amendment to be considered as pending.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to say one word. The gentleman from Wisconsin has made his remarks in reference to the investigation at Vicksburgh and has asked leave to print. We did not object. I understand his speech will appear on the Vicksburgh affair.

Now surely if that is so it is nothing more than fair and proper that the other side should be heard; and if the gentleman from Mississippi wishes——

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Let the gentleman print his speech.

Mr. SPEER. I have no speech to print.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I mean the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana admits the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to be pending.

Mr. COX. I have an amendment I wish to be admitted—the general amnesty bill as a substitute for the whole bill. I give notice that I will move that if I have the opportunity.

Mr. SHANKS. That is what ails the country now, that we did pass the general amnesty bill.

Mr. BECK. I rise to a privileged motion. Pending the demand for the previous question——

Mr. DAWES. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana if he proposes to allow further time for debate after the previous question is seconded?

Mr. COBURN. An hour.

Mr. DAWES. Then I understand that after all this time has been occupied by the members of the committee the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, begins again and announces to the House that he will occupy another hour in whatever way he pleases, farming it out to whomsoever he pleases.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. He has the right under the rules.

Mr. BURROWS. And that is the usual practice under the rules of the House.

Mr. COBURN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has ever acted otherwise himself I would like him to show it.

Mr. BECK. I move to suspend the rules and put upon its passage the bill which I send to the desk.

Mr. COBURN. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky cannot be entertained.

Mr. BECK. I desire to be heard a moment on that.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. On the point of order the Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. We are in the last four days of the session, and being a portion of the closing six days when motions to suspend the rules are in order at any time. This bill is not before the House on a motion to suspend the rules, as has been assumed, but is before the House in its regular order, the resolution having been offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] in the morning hour on Monday when the rules could not be suspended to pass anything under a two-thirds vote.

Under the ruling of the Chair, uniformly made, when any bill is before the House as the regular order during the last days of the session, the regular order can be taken off the floor by a motion to suspend the rules; which was done, as is shown by the record which I hold in my hand, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] took the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] off his feet when he had a bill similar to this. I know gentlemen have been going on the assumption that this bill is before the House on a motion to suspend the rules. That is a mistake as a matter of fact.

Mr. COBURN. But the gentleman does not propose merely to suspend the rules but to suspend me from my feet.

Mr. BECK. I propose to suspend the rules and all the proceedings on this bill. And I have a right to do it, unless all the uniform rulings of the Chair have deceived me.

Mr. TREMAIN. I understood the Chair to say distinctly, and no man dissented, that when these privileged reports were under consideration the gentleman could not be taken from his feet during the last six days of the session on a motion to suspend the rules; that this was a privileged matter, of higher privilege than an ordinary motion to suspend the rules. And in addition to that a motion has been made calling for the previous question on this bill, and the gentleman making that motion was upon his feet.

Mr. BECK. No; he had submitted the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the Clerk to read the order made yesterday morning by general consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

By unanimous consent.

Ordered, That the reading of the Journal is waived, and the Committee on Appropriations shall have this day until five p. m. for the consideration of the sundry civil bill, and a recess to be taken from five to half past seven, at which last hour House bill No. 4745 shall be taken up for debate only, the previous question to be called on the same when ordered by the House.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. Speaker, there was no unanimous consent to go any further than to make the effort to call the previous question. I reserved all further rights yesterday, and protested against anything more.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. I was on the floor yesterday morning insisting on making this motion then. But the question was whether the bill should be debated last night and to-day up to the time when it was sought to call the previous question; no right being waived to make this antagonizing motion.

The SPEAKER. Was it the understanding of the gentleman from Kentucky that the order that "the previous question shall be called on the same when ordered by the House"—that that was to be nugatory, impossible of fulfillment?

Mr. BECK. The point agreed upon was that the bill might be debated up till to-day, and the previous question might be called if it could; that was the expression.

The SPEAKER. But if the Chair should rule that the gentleman from Kentucky can move to suspend the rules, then the motion to suspend the rules could be repeated, and of course everybody will see that the agreement would amount to nothing.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as the agreement was made, I desire to say that it was the understanding of both sides that no right to either side would be lost or interfered with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard a word about the agreement until it was read at the Clerk's desk. He holds the original agreement in his hand, and for the sake of having it perfectly understood he will direct the Clerk to again read it.

Mr. RANDALL. And I ask that the proceedings in reference to it be also read from the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal is waived, and the Committee on Appropriations shall have this day until five o'clock p. m. for the consideration of the sundry civil bill, and a recess be taken from five o'clock to half past seven o'clock, at which last hour House bill No. 4745 shall be taken up for debate only, the previous question to be called on the same when ordered by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Now I ask that the Clerk read from the RECORD what occurred in relation to that agreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MILLIKEN. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules, so as to adopt that proposition.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to make this suggestion: that the previous question shall be considered as ordered at one o'clock on the following day.

Mr. ATKINS. I insist that the House shall come to order; it is impossible for any one to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. To restore order, the first thing is for members to resume their seats.

Mr. ATKINS. If they will do that, then everybody can hear what is going on.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to change his resolution so as to make it read "the sundry civil appropriation bill, and other appropriation bills."

Mr. RANDALL. You cannot get through with the sundry civil bill before five o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. But we may want to send the Indian appropriation bill to a conference committee, and other small bills.

Mr. RANDALL. My judgment is that the sundry civil bill will take the whole day.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I do not object to going on with the appropriation bills or to taking a recess, but I claim the right and do desire to move to suspend the rules, as I think I have a right to do, to set aside the hearing of the bill now about to be taken up; I do not desire to waive that right.

Mr. RANDALL. Any right the gentleman may have of that kind will not be interfered with by this agreement.

Mr. HURLBUT. This must either be done by unanimous consent or not by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT?]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object.

Mr. COBURN. I would like to say——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GIDDINGS] objects to the proposition. There is no need of discussing it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move then to suspend the rules and adopt the proposition which has been read.

Mr. COBURN. What I want to say is this: I do not propose to call the previous question at any time during the session of to-night, but I expect to call it at an early hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] is not before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and adopt that order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Can the reading of the Journal be interrupted for this purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is competent for the House to suspend the reading of the Journal and at the same time make an order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My inquiry is whether this motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] can come in to the interruption of the reading of the Journal. I do not object. I only want the ruling of the Chair as to whether we can interrupt the Journal to make an order of that kind.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know whether there is objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GIDDINGS] objects.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend from Texas [Mr. GIDDINGS] will withdraw that objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the gentleman from Texas to object to the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] not to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a question of order. I cannot hear anything that is going on.

The SPEAKER. Nor can the Chair.

Mr. CESSNA. Is it not in order for me to appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to modify his proposition, so as to say "appropriation bills" instead of "the sundry civil appropriation bill?"

The SPEAKER. That is not of the slightest practical consequence.

Mr. CESSNA. I presumed I had the right to make the inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. COX. If we had order this thing could be arranged amicably.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not submit any proposition till there is order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection, the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Illinois is made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SENER. I move to reconsider the action just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I wish now to make a statement in relation to calling the previous question. I propose to-morrow at one o'clock, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to call the previous question.

Mr. COX. You cannot get consent to that.

Mr. COBURN. I only give this notice. I do not undertake to bind anybody by the announcement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Now, under that order up to this time the plans as laid out in it have been followed. There was no objection made excepting to granting the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] to have the hour fixed for ordering the previous question, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] interposed the remark that he would attempt to do what he is now trying to do.

Mr. RANDALL. And following that I made the statement, which was not contradicted either by the Speaker or by any member on the floor, that any right he would have of that kind would not be interfered with by this agreement.

Mr. BECK. If that had not been the understanding I should have refused to waive my right to make this motion.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to make this suggestion, that it seems to me from the reading of the agreement and the arrangement made that all which has been done up to the present time is consistent with it. But that agreement goes no further than the time when the previous question can be called, and that whatever rights existed previous to the agreement that was entered into were the same at the point of time reached when the unanimous consent ends, and that is the point of time when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] calls the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the language of the agreement is so entirely plain that it is not susceptible of two constructions. It was that yesterday up to five o'clock should be spent in the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and that a recess should be taken from that hour until half past seven o'clock. That was so absolute that the Chair relieved the Committee of the Whole from a motion to rise and took the Chair at five o'clock. The agreement further was that there should be debate at an evening session on the bill No. 4745; but no agreement was made as to the time when the previous question was to be called. That is the way the Chair reads it; and he thinks that is the only way in which it can be read. There was no agreement as to when the previous question was to be called. Therefore no gentleman is bound to vote for it by reason of any understanding as to the time at which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] would call the previous question. That, the Chair thinks, is the understanding of the gentleman himself, that there was no time at which the House agreed the previous question should be called.

Mr. COBURN. There was no time fixed.

The SPEAKER. It was left wholly in the control of the majority. If the Chair should give the construction to this order contended for by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] then he must say, without endeavoring or wishing to use language which would seem to be disrespectful, that it would appear that the Chair and the majority of the House had both been entrapped; that there was a concealed trick in the wording of the resolution. This the Chair does not and cannot believe.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The proposition came from the other side.

The SPEAKER. It makes no difference where it came from. It came by the agreement which was proposed by the gentlemam from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. RANDALL. Just there let me make a statement. The resolution, as originally submitted, provided that the previous question should not be called sooner than one o'clock. In my judgment that was a humiliation to the minority as well as an interference with their rights, and I so stated, if my memory serves me rightly, to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] who submitted it to me. By agreement that was stricken out, and a change made so that the humiliation or reflection upon the minority should not be in the agreement. And it was in accordance with that change that I made the remark which I did in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow a question by the Chair——

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. What was the gain, what was the arrangement worth under that construction of it?

Mr. RANDALL. It secured debate and facilitated the passage of the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but what is the use of securing debate upon a measure if it is never to be allowed to come to a vote?

Mr. RANDALL. It was the intention that the same rights that then existed against the bill under the rule should continue to exist whenever we reached the point for their exercise. And we thereby avoided the reading of the Journal, which would have taken probably five hours. Now, my clear conviction as to the effect of that agreement was, and I so stated in as terse language as it can be stated, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] would lose no right whatever, and that statement met with no contradiction on the other side.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say here——

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say a word, as a remark has been made indicating that there was a trick somewhere.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair did not say so.

Mr. BECK. I want to say that there was no trick and no concealed purpose on my part, for I declared then, as the record shows, that I intended to move to suspend the rules, as I had a right to do, and did not desire to waive that right; and I said I would not waive it. The gentleman from Indiana himself closed his remarks by saying, "I only give this notice; I do not undertake to bind anybody."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky of course cannot imagine that the mere giving notice of a motion is binding upon the Chair to receive it. A great many notices of motions are given to the Chair that never go any further.

Mr. BECK. It shows that the House agreed with my view of it.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not a complete answer to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that the House is already acting under a suspension of the rules, and that this arrangement of yesterday was simply as to the course of debate?

The SPEAKER. There is no need of going back of the record at all on that point. The Chair thinks that this arrangement either meant this or it meant nothing.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, "Will the House second the demand for the previous question?" The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] who makes the motion, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who opposes it, will act as tellers.

Mr. HYNES. I would like to inquire of the Chair, so that we may have a clear understanding, what are the questions which will be voted upon if the previous question is seconded?

The SPEAKER. There is pending an amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to modify the thirteenth section. There is also an amendment pending by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to strike out the thirteenth section. And then there is another amendment submitted this morning by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to strike out the first, second, and fourth sections of the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to propose a modification of the amendment of my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] in regard to the thirteenth section.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I accept the modification as a part of my amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The modification I propose is to insert these words, "such limits being included within the following-named States: Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, or Alabama." Those are the States in regard to which the House has investigated.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object to any amendment that does not include the whole Union.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My colleague has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I accept the amendment of my colleague [Mr. G. F. HOAR] as a modification of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. That the gentleman has a right to do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts will also insert a limitation in point of time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have done that.

Mr. GARFIELD. What limitation?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Two years.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether, if the motion for the previous question should not prevail, the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to move to suspend the rules or will allow other amendments to be offered?

The SPEAKER. The bill remains before the House until disposed of, whether the previous question is now seconded or not. If it should not be seconded, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who was claiming the floor when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] indicated his desire for the previous question. It is the duty of the Chair to allow the House to decide whether the previous question shall be ordered. If the House does not order the previous question the status of the bill is not changed, but it gives the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] the right to address the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will it be in order to move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] by inserting Massachusetts and Indiana?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be seconded, it will not be in order to move any amendment whatever.

Mr. COX. I wish to know whether an amendment which would require for its final adoption a two-third vote of both Houses would be liable to a point of order. I desire to move to amend this bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting as a substitute a provision for general amnesty.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. No amendment can be offered without unanimous consent; and objection being made it is unnecessary for the Chair to rule on the point of order.

The House divided on seconding the previous question; and the tellers reported—ayes 135, noes 110.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question then recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. BANNING called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 106, not voting 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. So the main question was ordered.

During the vote,

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, stated that he was paired with Mr. PIKE, who would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, stated that he was paired with Mr. SMALL, who would vote in the affimative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. ALBRIGHT stated he had received a telegram from his colleague, Mr. BIERY, that he was confined to his room by sickness, and if present would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. DOBBINS stated that he was paired with Mr. SLOSS, who would vote in the affirmative, while he himself would vote in the negative.

Mr. CALDWELL stated that his colleague, Mr. SLOSS, was detained at his house by sickness.

Mr. HURLBUT stated that Mr. STRAWBRIDGE was confined to his room by illness and was unable to be present.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 134) for the relief of Daniel S. Mershon, jr.; when the Speaker signed the same.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Are not my amendments pending?

The SPEAKER. They will be voted on.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to close debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to an hour under the rules.

Mr. COBURN. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] most cordially for the privilege of speaking in his time.

It is with great embarrassment that I rise now to speak on this topic. Observing old friends who have served with me in other days of trial, when kindred themes stirred us to debate, (referring to Hon. George H. Pendleton, Hon. Mr. Bocock, of Virginia, and others, who sat near,) and surrounded as I am by a score of members of the next Congress, I feel like one standing on an isthmus between two seas; and the solemnity which comes with the shadow of memory is clouded by the portents of our future. If such bills as this are to pass, what is to be our condition?

FORCE OR AMNESTY.

Expressed, not by its title, but by the name it has assumed among the people, it is a force bill. The best way to antagonize it is by substituting kindness and justice. Hence my notice of an amendment to replace its rigorous provisions of hate and coercion by a bill for general and generous amnesty.

I had the honor to introduce one among the first bills for amnesty here; and it came within two votes of passing. That was as early as 1869. Since then this House in moments of unimpassioned patriotism has indicated its preference in the same direction. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in December, 1870, introduced his bill "for full and general grace, amnesty, and oblivion." It was mainly copied from an old English statute about the Scotch rebellion. I could not then help but characterize his bill for pains and penalties as a meager system of mercy. It was characterized as grace which was grudging, amnesty which was exceptional, and oblivion full of memories. It was ungracious grace and punitory pardon. It was a rushing and turbulent Lethe. I plead for mercy on the eternal plan: no eternizing of persecution; no probing of the old wounds. That bill had in it what is omitted here, oblivion for the agents and officers of the United States engaged in reconstruction. I miss that here. No one here and now offers to pardon the Kelloggs, Durells, Packards, Sheridans, and others engaged in fettering the State of Louisiana.

But, sir, what more can be said of the unwisdom of further repression by the Federal janissaries and oppression by the ductile Federal usurpers? What more can be said against the suspension of the writ of liberty? What now is its object? Who dare allege a state of affairs, South or North, which requires such suspension? The Constitution (article 1, section 9) wisely prohibits such suspension, "unless in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." Who seriously pretends that there is any more "rebellion" in the legal and adjudged sense, than there is "invasion" from within or abroad? This suspension of the great writ is the part of a plan hereafter to be dissected, which provokes to violence, with a view to fresh election complications.

HISTORIC LESSONS ON GRACE.

Can we not learn from history? Must we again cite instances for civil guidance? Must we go to Montesquieu to show that the business of statesmanship is not to destroy the rebel, but the rebellion; or to Ossian for the metaphor of many streams against the enemy, but as a zephyr that moves the grass to the vanquished? Have the lessons of Roman history, drawn from Cicero—to fortify the Republic with acts of kindness—no application to our condition? Is there nothing in the refinement of the tournament which lifted up the knight of the lowered lance? Is the history of England, in its relations toward Wales, America, Scotland, Ireland, nothing to us for precept and example? Are the Hebraic, Grecian, Christian teachings—the bloom and fragrance of all civilized polity—nothing? As summed up by a quaint English writer—whose thought I have adopted for my title page—the very genius of good government—after rebellion, or before to avert it—resides in the compact of concord. Why cannot we write our wrongs in ashes; draw the curtain over injuries? Forgiveness is not forgiveness—if we only pray God to forgive our enemy and we do not ourselves pardon. We must forgive without reserve; forgive wholly, as we hope for forgiveness.

All bills framed in any other spirit will fail as all your coercive bills have failed for conciliation. You cannot sow this land with dragon's teeth and expect other than a harvest of armed disasters.

THE POINTS OF BAD POLICY—DISCONTENT.

Whatever, therefore, Mr. Speaker, may be the outrages South, and whoever is responsible, the large and dominating fact remains, that tranquillity is absent. Its lack is the evidence and sign of bad rule. Grapes are not of thorns, nor figs of thistles. It is the good tree that bringeth forth good fruit. Let us test these acts of reconstruction and force by their fruits. Unless we do so, our remedies will be inadequate, and the more bitter the future fruitage.

MORAL TREASON AND SOCIAL ANARCHY.

I speak to-day as I have often spoken before in this House, against measures fraught with such consequences, and therefore I speak against moral treason and social anarchy. My remarks are not made to grace the utterance and fervor of an hour, to vibrate for a moment in angry debate; they have been pondered and repondered in the quietude of my room, so that no sophistical reasoning should escape my own criticism. There is no merit, no intrepedity on my part, in challenging the wisdom or the results of that repressive and distrustful policy which has made chaos instead of order in the Southern States since the war.

RECONSTRUCTION AND ITS RESULTS.

At the beginning of the reconstruction measures upon the bill introduced by Henry Winter Davis in 1864, to reform Tennessee on the plan of one-tenth rule of her people, I opposed with all the vehemence and illustration within my reach the rickety plan of commencing to build at the roof and not at the foundation. The reconstruction measures which followed the close of the war have undergone the tests of time and experience; that they are vitally deficient, that they have been worse administered, all will agree who look below the superfices of our social and political order. They have failed in the object of government, peace, security, nationality, and patriotism.

HISTORY OF RECONSTRUCTION—COERCION.

The history of reconstruction is a painful one—"infandum dolorem." From the beginning of President Johnson's proclamation on the 9th of May, 1865, as to Virginia, and continuing down through the contest with Congress and by the veto, one idea seemed prominent with the Executive and his able cabinet—amnesty. It was partial and limited at first; but it exacted as a compensation certain concessions, which were promptly made by the States. President Johnson did not, however, coerce the States into determining any policy as to suffrage. The platforms of the dominant party denied to those lately in rebellion any participation in reforming the States. They had forfeited, it was said, their right by treason. President Johnson was derided; his policy scorned; his mild methods contemned; and in the finale he barely escaped losing his own high office through the malice of those who were hunting down the South. His touch-stone to bring patriotism to the test, pardon, he favored no bayonet rule, and his general-in-chief, Grant, was his adviser in this noble policy. Then came the Thirty-ninth Congress with its presiding genius, Thaddeus Stevens; and with it and with him fell the hopes of all; for that Congress began the work which, built with untempered mortar, is already tumbling about us. To rescue it or to remove it is the duty of coming Congresses. Following the Freedmen's Bureau and the civil-rights bills, disqualifying measures and military districts, dictations to States and enabling acts for representation, came supplemental bills, until what with vetoes and soldiers, and registers of votes and crude constitutions, there sprung full armed the model "omnibus bill" for the admission of certain States on certain conditions. These measures were the forerunners of the two bills this session which have drawn so much attention from the public and which have required all the vigilance, mental and physical, of the minority here to postpone and defeat. Each and all are samples of the utter failure of the coercive principle; and the present bill is but a copy of its antitypes, founded on the idea that suffrage is in danger; that the black suffragans are weak and are easily intimidated; and that as republicans are entitled to the votes of the Africans willy nilly, so all the processes for prosecution, fine, and imprisonment, and all the modes to supervise, spy out, and influence the voter and the ballot-box, even to the use of military force, ought to be used. What for? To continue republican partisan ascendency, though it imperil every State in the Republic.

It is this policy which the democracy and its liberal allies boldly confront. It is this policy which it was the object of the late popular expression to condemn.

I propose to-day to discuss the present situation not merely in view of the recent elections, which have an inner meaning with respect to this subject, but with a view to show wherein the objects of good government have been frustrated, and if possible to evoke a remedy commensurate with these extensive and momentous mischiefs. First, waiving for the present any allusion to the complex nature of our Federal and local governments, not forgetting that we have one supreme government as to certain affairs, and not necessarily one in all things, let me test by recent events the wisdom of our post-war policy. No one will dispute as to certain objects of civil government, and, whether written or unwritten, that these objects are designed to protect personal liberty and honest property. It is the province of government to throw its force against the strong hand of individual violence and in favor of the gentle methods of judicial arbitration, and we are not the less bound to save the system on which we are ingrafted from any external power which would injure. By the same right whereby we protect men of all religions in their conscientious convictions, government should protect men of all classes against rapine and spoliation. Government should assure the man who sows, the privilege of reaping. His harvest is his to use as he pleases, subject only to those exactions which are indispensable to the maintenance of the government which protects his industry. What a satire on these organic principles is the recent misgovernment in the South, I will presently determine. The question is not as to whether the State or the Federal Government is responsible, or which is most responsible. The fact remains that in the effort to restore States, to rebuild their dismantled social order—contentment, the object of all government, has been wanting. Military compression and civil oppression have made large bodies of men reckless of the old divisions of power.

DESPERATION SOUTH.

Men in their desperation, who once had just and elevated views of our polity, have cried out sometimes for imperial power, sometimes for military rule, and sometimes for revolution. Civil convulsions, sometimes marked with blood, and sometimes taking the form of race conflict, have accompanied this discontent. It is no longer a question of political union so much, for all discontented men South have been willing to be pinned to the Union even by an honest bayonet, or held to it by a mailed hand, or shackled to it by an iron gyve. Nor will it be doubted that throughout this decade of discontent and convulsion there has been an aspiration for civil discipline and patriotic allegiance. This has been chilled by our conduct on its every demonstration. And yet without this aspiration no State can be permanent. When that protection, which is the consideration and correlative of allegiance, fails so signally and constantly, all history teaches that then the bond of allegiance becomes thin and weak, society declines, and tyranny supervenes. It may be a question whether in such a condition foreign conquest may not be a blessing. I assert that underlying all the trials and troubles, frauds and oppressions, whether by judicial decree or military proclamation, this is the capital crime of the party just retiring from power.

ALLEGIANCE AND PROTECTION.

A French philosopher has said that "in all forms of government the feeling of allegiance or loyalty is the condition of contentment." There must be in the constitution of the state something which is settled—unquestionably permanent—which cannot be dispensed with, secure against all vicissitude and change. This is the sacred something in our system of Federal and State governments which is above discussion, and which is founded upon the sovereign will of the people. That sacred something is found not merely in the Federal Constitution, but in all those rights reserved and all those powers ungranted which belong to State or local administration. Break this mystic union of Federal and State systems, allow the one to encroach upon the other, and you lose the sacramental essence, the divine appointment which inspires loyalty and gives hope and courage and honor to labor, liberty, property, and life. Nations, ancient and modern, have risen or fallen according as they have comprehended or violated this fundamental law.

It is not my purpose to review the causes which produced, or the circumstances which justified the civil war, either from one standpoint or another. When at Appomattox Court-House the bugles sounded the great truce it was hoped that the conditions of peace, tranquil government, and a contented people would be observed; that all future griefs would be solaced; that magnanimity would conquer angry hatred, scorn, and revenge, and that for many uncounted decades there would be no interregnum in the serene dynasty of peace and love; that through the bleeding and bloody land, and over the scenes of death and the sorrows of mourning, the lethean wave would flow. We have had the lethean wave, but the only repose has been that of despair and death. It was all Lethe except its sleep; it was all death without its repose. Homes have been wasted, property confiscated and destroyed, enterprises ruined, cities burned, a whole country swathed in destruction. We had hoped amid these immeasurable calamities that the hates and griefs would not be perpetuated; that the new generation should not wear the rancor in their hearts till their hair had whitened for the tomb; that they would not teach their children to perpetuate the hate of their fathers.

TEN YEARS OF MOCKERY.

For ten long years all these hopes have been mocked; and what a mockery! God has fixed his creatures in this fair land in habitations bound together by the same rivers, mountains, lakes, and skies. He has fixed in their hearts the ennobling principles of peace. He has sent to this star the very Prince of Peace, as an exemplar and Saviour, and yet these benefactions are turned by the passions and ambitions of men into shameful mockery.

We had good right to believe that the truce would have been kept. We must not forget the record made by General Grant himself shortly after the war.

GENERAL GRANT'S TESTIMONY IN 1865 AS TO SOUTHERN SENTIMENT AND CONTENT.

In the midst of the deep wrath which the outrageous Louisiana usurpation has roused and the various arguments employed to defend as well as denounce it, one simple connection of circumstances seems to have been entirely overlooked. Logically considered, it indicates that the President's views have undergone an alarming modification, since he was made President, in the interest of perpetuating himself in his office or certainly in that of Federal military interference in political affairs.

The inconsistency as revealed by his own official papers is so gross that no explanation can be made without attributing motives of dangerous ambition. I do not refer to his portentous change of opinion as to Arkansas since the session began, but to his wide departure from his own just observations of 1865.

General Grant in his official report to the President of his southern State inspection, under date December 18, 1865, writes:

> I am satisfied the thinking men of the South accept the present situation of affairs in good faith. * * * There is such universal acquiescence in the authority of the General Government throughout the portions of the country visited by me, that the mere presence of a military force without regard to numbers is sufficient to maintain order.

If such was the condition of the South, and especially of New Orleans, where General Grant made his longest stay during his tour of inspection in 1865, what must have been the maladministration there since to produce a revulsion of sentiment which seems to call for the present repressive course? Who is responsible for it? The President and his friends have had a free rein, and the result according to their own showing is a condition of present anarchy in contrast with that he reported nine years previous.

The following extracts from an official letter to the President by General Grant, under date October 24, 1866, indicate the views of the latter relative to the employment of troops in political contests

The letter is the most statesmanlike I have read from Genera. Grant, as the following extracts may show:

> The conviction is forced on my mind that no reason now exists for giving or promising the military aid of the Government to support the laws of Maryland. The tendency of giving such aid or promise would be to produce the very result intended to be averted. So far there seems to be merely a very bitter contest for political ascendency in the State.
> Military interference would be interpreted as giving aid to one of the factions, no matter how pure the intentions or how guarded or just the instructions.
> It is a contingency I hope never to see arise in this country while I occupy the position of General-in-Chief of the Army, to have to send troops to a State in full relations with the General Government on the eve of an election to preserve the peace. If insurrection does come, the law provides the method of calling out the forces to suppress it.

How are General Grant's opinions of the condition of the Southern States, including Louisiana, and his views of the impropriety of employing the military forces of the Government in politics, reconcilable with his late acts, except upon the hypothesis that he ignores fact and patriotism for some ambitious end?

If our countrymen patiently abide this usurpation, a great barrier to empire will have been destroyed, and the third term and future terms be at the behest of one whose views, under the exercise of power, have sustained the change I have represented. I hope the issue may not be confused.

MR. LINCOLN'S POLICY.

It will not be denied that ten years ago, when reconstruction was first broached, there were men or fiends who talked utter extermination. Mr. Lincoln did not share this execrable spirit. He proposed to reach the South by friendly means; with him charity predominated; in his death the South was crucified. His policy, as indicated in his messages and in the dispatches of Mr. Seward, would at once have filled the vacant seats of southern members without convulsion and without discontent; and whatever changes had taken place under the new order created by the war, they would have accorded easily, naturally, and in the interest of harmony and peace. And the colored race, to-day lying despoiled, stricken, and cast off, even from the paternal Government, would have been elevated, cared for, and their labor made more remunerative under better conditions of freedom and independence. Mr. Lincoln had not read history in vain. It was an open book to him; and what did it not reveal? The pitiless destruction of the Moors of Andalusia by the second Philip, the merciless slaughter of the French in La Vendée, the sanguinary pursuit of Claverhouse after the Scottish covenanters, the stained and cadaverous cheek of Ireland, the maddening history of Poland, the history of all subjected and despoiled provinces and countries, and, sir, the terrible reaction upon those who despoiled and subjected them. In the place of the Lincoln policy of charity and peace, ay, even in the place of sudden calamities, radical reconstruction has given us prolonged torture. The fruits of that policy are not seen in the strength, stability, grandeur or progress of our nation, nor in the condition of our business and our labor, of our commerce and our credit. They are seen in the wasting of revenues, or in fact the non-collection of revenue through impoverishment.

SPOLIATION OF THE SOUTH.

The Mississippi is still ours to the Gulf, but where is its commerce? Charleston looks out upon Sumter, and Sumter has nothing to protect. The sea islands no longer echo to the music, the exultation and hope of an industrious people. There is only heard there the discourse of mangy politicians of all grades of degradation, worshiping their radical fetich. Some of these States were happily rescued before being thoroughly impoverished—Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia. They received an infusion of new life, because the weapon with which they were struck was not entirely lethal. Beneath this rule of men entirely bad, whose consciousless course had much to do with their maladministration, there was a vicious heresy. It was the fountain of bitter and poisonous waters. That heresy held that certain States had sacrificed their corporate existence; it held that they were no longer component members of the Union; it contradicted the declared object and principle of the war. It transferred the right to govern them to a Congress which was not omnipotent. Hence, when reconstruction began through Congress, it assumed that an oligarchy of one-tenth should reform the States. Hence disqualifying amendments, and odious conditions; hence agents to govern who were not selected by the people of the States; hence a large field was opened for executive bashaws and adventurous rascals; and hence by a natural sequence the source of power which should have been in the States was fixed at the Federal capital. And wherein does such a government differ from the rankest orientalism? Conquered provinces and oligarchical States, in place of the constituted local State governments, are both a solecism and a weakness. Such a condition could not give content. It put in jeopardy the liberties and governments of the people North; it became an image, part brass and part clay; and the intolerable oppression upon one-half of the country became a burden and a reproach to the other.

PATERNAL GOVERNMENT.

It was not in the nature of things in this country, it was not in accordance with our traditions or our organic laws, that the duties of the Federal Government should be paternal. It was not possible in nature for a government to love its subjects as a father his children. Show me the government, or the agents of a government, distinct and irresponsible as the Federal Government is from the States, which for purposes of honest and wise rule is as superior in intelligence to its people as a father is to his child. Such a paternal affection is as irrational and certainly more dangerous than the figment of the constitution which Locke made for North Carolina, or which Plato made for his imaginary commonwealth. This congressional reconstructive paternity, with its new-born Bureaus, undertook to fill the platonic idea by occupying in the moral the place of "the all"—το παν. Macaulay satirizes this utopian danger when he says: "Why should not Government take away the child from the mother, select the nurse, regulate the school, overlook the play-ground, prescribe what parodies shall be sung, what tune shall be played, what books shall be read, what physic shall be swallowed? Why should it not choose our wives, limit our expenses, stint us to a certain number of dishes of meat, of glasses of wine, and of cups of tea?" What with agricultural, educational, freedmen's, and other Bureaus, and added to them this Federal supervision over elections, with flagellating penalties and the paramount rule of the military in this bill, if we do not have a paternal government, then no such government is possible. To ascertain the value of such paternal care, it may be well to go into the figures of arithmetic, which are more emphatic on such questions than figures of rhetoric.

DEBTS AND LIABILITIES SOUTH.

I do not now refer to the direct losses, estimated at seven billions, which the war occasioned, nor the incalculable indirect consequences in the losses of enterprises and industries; but I refer just now to the debts and liabilities of these Southern States since the war, as developed by the Ku-Klux report of 1872, a succinct statement of which is as follows:

Alabama.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $5,939,654.87; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $38,381,967.37.

Arkansas.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $4,036,952.87; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $19,761,265.62.

Florida.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $221,000; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $15,763,447.54.

Georgia.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, nominal; debts and liabilities June, 1871, $50,137,500. (See statement of Mr. Angier, treasurer of Georgia.)

Louisiana.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $10,099,074.34; debts and liabilities June 1, 1871, including the excess of expenditures over receipts, $50,540,206.91.

North Carolina.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $9,699,500; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $34,887,467.85.

South Carolina.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $5,000,000; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $39,158,914.47.

Mississippi.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, nominal; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, about $2,000,000.

Tennessee.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $20,105,606.66; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $45,688,263.46.

Texas.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, nominal; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $20,361,000.

Virginia.—Debts and liabilities at the close of the war, $31,938,144.59; debts and liabilities January 1, 1872, $45,480,542.21.

In this list Louisiana is stated under the truth. We are advised that at this time the debt is $65,000,000, the interest $4,000,000, while $5,000,000 more is to be added for the expenses of a State administration not the product of a legal election. This goes on and will go on under the ambiguous pusillanimity of Congress; for does not Congress by its non-action authorize the President to prop Kellogg's power by the bayonet? Does not Congress, in its Punic faith, allow Louisiana to be bound in withes, that it may be more readily plundered? Where and when is there to be any relief?

MATERIAL LOSSES BY RECONSTRUCTION POLICIES.

Would you know further how this paternal reconstruction and its bad policies have affected material interests South? Let me call your attention to some statistics to illustrate the nature and effect of these bayonet and bureau governments. In Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas the illustration is peculiarly significant. On all the cereals, cotton, tobacco, live stock, farms, personal estates, wool, peas and beans, potatoes, and butter, the increase from 1850 to 1860 is in sad contrast with the decrease from 1860 to 1870, under the policy of hate and spoliation. The tables will show the percentage of decrease. They will also show what would have been the prosperity of these States under orderly rule. The loss on tobacco is seventy-five millions, on cereals one hundred millions, on cotton four hundred millions, on stock four hundred and eighty millions, and on farms four thousand millions. But to the table:

Had the wealth of these States increased from 1860 to 1870 as it did from 1850 to 1860, there would have been in 1870—

Cereals	$364,890,743	instead of	$236,069,168

The value of all farm productions in 1870 was $633,236,435. That of 1860 is not given in the census of 1860, but the quantities are and the crop, comparing quantities shows a loss as compared with those of 1860 of 45 per cent. If the values of the productions by given quantities are the same, the crop of 1860 was $918,192,829, and that is greater than the crop of 1870 by $284,956,394. What a commentary is here on such policies as this bill intrudes upon the country!

Now, if we compare the crop of 1860 with what the crop of 1870 ought to have been by increase of population and labor, we find that it fell over four hundred millions below what it ought to have been. Who is responsible for these losses? Ah! but it may be said, "this is the consequence of the war that ended in 1865." Let us see if it is so. How are we to account for the fact that in 1859 these States raised 282,626,000 bushels of corn, and in 1873, fourteen years afterward, and eight years after the war, with a million additional population, they only raised 217,741,000 bushels. How is it that they raised 31,441,826 bushels of wheat in 1859 and only 24,574,000 in 1873? How is it that Louisiana in 1859 raised 230,982 hogsheads of sugar and in 1873 89,498? What do these figures mean since the war: 1870 144,881; 1871, 128,461; 1872, 108,520; 1873, 89,498. Do they not mean reconstruction; that the blight did not exhaust itself at the end of the war, but points its skeleton hand to a lower deep yet to be touched by a wretched and distracted people? If bills like these are to pass to harass and vex industries and people, who can tell the lowest depth of that deep with which the South is threatened? As the aggregate of these Southern States shows a falling off in acreage, it may be thought this depression in agriculture arose from the farms destroyed by the armies in the field during the war. To show that this is error, we will take the State of Texas, to whose distinguished representative [Mr. MILLS] I am greatly indebted for these economic observations.

Texas is by far the most prosperous of all the Southern States; because there was no Federal army during the war, and no destruction of farms by armies. Besides there is an increased acreage by reason of the heavy immigration of whites since the war. We find, however, the same melancholy prostration of farming interests, as follows:

NATIONAL WEALTH IN ALL THE STATES AND ITS DECREASE UNDER RECONSTRUCTION.

1850	$7,135,600,800
1860	16,159,616,668
1870	26,967,281,172

Increase in wealth from 1850 to 1860, 1.28 per cent.
Increase in wealth from 1860 to 1870, 68 per cent.

The material wealth of 1870 is reduced to gold at 111½, the premium on gold 30th of June, 1870, to make comparison with the gold value of 1850 and 1860.

The same remark applies to the next succeeding table on agriculture.

The censuses of 1850 and 1860 do not, like 1870, give the value of all farm productions, but they do give the quantities. Mr. Grosvenor, in his work on political economy published in 1868, says the value of all farm productions in 1860 was about $2,600,000,000, and that it increased 100 per cent. from 1850 to 1860. By looking at the quantities produced, as shown in the census, he is fully sustained in his estimate.

Then we have in 1860, 163,110,720 acres in cultivation; in 1870, 188,921,099 acres.

From my best information, I estimate that it will cost $10 per acre on an average of crops to cultivate them; but if this is not correct as an estimate, it will not affect the result, as it will be applied to both periods and will affect them equally:

	1860.	1870.
Cash value of farms and farming implements	$6,801,263,148	$8,509,580,529
Cash value of productions on estimate of Grosvenor	2,600,000,000	2,195,101,935
Cost of production at $10 per acre	1,631,107,200	1,889,210,990
Net profit	968,892,700	305,890,945

Loss on productions of 1870 as compared with 1860, $404,898,065.
Net profit in 1860, 14 per cent.
Net profit in 1870, 3½ per cent.

But we see from the tables in the census that the productions increased 100 per cent. from 1850 to 1860. If nothing had retarded the prosperity of our agriculture, it would have continued to increase at the same ratio of 100 per cent.; then the production of 1870 ought to have been 100 per cent. over 1860, or $5,200,000,000; but it was only $2,195,100,935, showing a loss of $3,004,898,065. Notwithstanding there were over twenty-five million more acres in cultivation and over sixteen hundred millions more money invested in farms and farming implements and seven millions more people, the crop is over four hundred millions below the crop of 1860. Who is responsible?

To illustrate the growth from 1850 to 1860, I present the following statements:

Products.	1850.	1860.	1870.
Cotton	$2,469,093	$5,387,052	$3,011,996
Corn	592,071,104	838,792,742	760,944,549
Tobacco	199,752,655	434,209,461	262,735,341
Wheat	100,485,944	173,104,924	287,745,626

The census tables show an increase from 1850 to 1860 and decrease from 1860 to 1870:

Products.	Increased, 1850 to 1860.	Decreased, 1860 to 1870.
Cotton	118	44
Tobacco	117	39
Buckwheat	96	44
Rye	48	19
Peas and beans	64	61
Mules, &c	105	2
Oxen	32	41
Hogs	10	25
Cattle	52	8

Wheat showed an increase at both periods, but 6 per cent. greater at 1860 than 1870.

These facts from the census serve to illustrate the general ideas which apply to the underlying principle, or rather lack of principle, upon which reconstruction was based. The principle necessarily involved perfidious and bad agencies to realize it, and consequently losses of property, direct, consequential, and otherwise.

VAGABOND AGENCIES SOUTH.

Perhaps the crying sin of these agencies was their vagabond qualities. The great body of the men who undertook to carry out this reconstruction were vagrant peripatetics, having no fixed and abiding interest in the place where they sat down. They generally had two thoughts: first, to make all they could, and, second, to move off with what they had made. The right of locomotion without passports or hinderance is one of the most sacred rights which any free government can give. I applaud the proper and beneficent offices of immigration, but I denounce its counterfeit and abuse. Immigration is a part of the history of the last few centuries. All our people had ancestors who were scattered from the Rhine to the Liffey, from the Danube to the Thames. There is a utility and a beauty in this exodus from the Old World to the New. The value and grandeur such immense movements mean to this new hemisphere all appreciate, and but for this movement from 1790 till to-day we would have but ten millions of people in our land at the present moment. No one objects to this movement, for it brings hundreds of millions of values as well in gold and silver as in industry, mind, and muscle.

UTILITY OF INTERSTATE RELATIONS.

But if any portion of such a movement came to overturn our attractive system of government, to change the form and the substance of our polity, we would at once cease to be attractive. We should at once close our gates to the exodus. Between our States this exodus is double that of any other country. Our Magna Charta gives us the right of free egress and regress. That right, like our writ of habeas corpus, has contributed to our advancement. Even trees and plants improve by transplanting, but the transplanting should be rightly done. It should be suited to the soil and protected against winter frosts and adverse winds. We have the same right to go and come as to post our letters or otherwise commune with our friends. When, therefore, adventurous rascality travels only to despoil, and denunciation falls upon it, the denunciation is in favor of that rightful and healthy movement by which States are peopled, elevated, and energized.

When the reconstruction measures began to be organized under such bad agencies, the very lethargy and devastation of the South attracted not merely good citizens who would build up, but a horde of the bad who would tear down. All desirable populations were welcomed at the South; they deserved and received encouragement. They were not the jackalls to the lions of war, or hyenas among the graves of the dead. No man in Georgia objected to an artisan going there to help manufacture cotton; no man in Louisiana complained if a stranger rescued a wasted sugar plantation from the alligator; no man in Texas complained of the German who went there to raise cereals, cotton, or cattle. The complaint and the grievance begin when the myrmidons of political power, the mercenaries and the suttlers, the bureaucrats and adventurers, who have no local habitation or name, make alliance with illiteracy, fan race prejudices, despoil railroads, and revel in inordinate taxations. These men not only discredited the bonds of their States in the markets, upon the exchange, but dislocated by their devices the industries of the South.

THE DISFRANCHISED—THE SUPERIOR RACE.

Having no part in the honors and offices that belong to self-government, the best men were powerless before such an alliance. These adventurers were the cuckoos who sat upon the eggs of other birds—the scum which rose to the top of political reconstruction. They were called carpet-baggers, not because they always carried one of those indispensable articles of travel, for many of them were not even provided with that article, but they moved in a mysterious way, with no fixed mode of life or the animus manendi. The carpet-bagger had little to go on and much to get. He made out of negro credulity a living, and he made the negro his prey. He began as a sharper and was reconstructed as a statesman. He had a bayonet within call, and even before the happy days of "overflowed bacon," he had rations in abundance. He not only registered votes at pleasure, but became an organic law-maker and a legislator. The less he had at stake, the more he had of taxes. The county and State offices at first filled his ambition; then he aspired, when plethoric with funds, to be Congressman, Senator, and governor. He waxed fat and kicked. He kicked the negro, and by a beautiful law of nature the negro is just now beginning to return the compliment. His chief occupation has been to count votes that were never cast, and count out wages which were never earned, and to make all who despise him appear as unrepentant rebels. How could reconstruction stand on such loose material?

OTHER GRIEVANCES.

One of the great grievances of our fathers was the creation of a multitude of new offices and a swarm of officers from abroad to harass the people and eat of their substance. Our fathers complained of the establishment of a foreign jurisdiction. The quartering of armed troops completed the work of desolation and tyranny. Every one of these complaints find their counterpart in the gospel of anarchy preached through bills like the present one, and in the moral treason which inspires their enactment.

"REGULATE" ELECTIONS.

A part of this programme of anarchy and tyranny is the power granted in this bill to petty Federal officers over elections. Have we not had enough of these sickening examples? Let us have done with a set of men who can postpone "regular" elections or "correct" their returns, just as it best suits the purpose of the master, who with an unlimited executive police at his elbow, with unlimited powers, can levy taxes to pay them, collect taxes not authorized, declare martial law, suspend the habeas corpus, erect military commissions, try his subjects, and hang them—by your authority and in consequence of your enactment!

This is all your own work, gentlemen of the majority! You want to repeat it for 1876, do you? The very first act of congressional usurpation was the prelude to all the drama, the key-note to the whole of this infernal chorus. When it became possible to do one thing outside or above the Constitution, it became necessary to order all your actions on that plane. Every line must needs be longer than a straight line, and no action of yours outside the Constitution could fail to breed evil and prepare the way for misery.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

Am I asked whether these thoughts lead toward the repeal of the amendments of the Constitution which grew out of the war and its conditions? I answer, that these amendments, if rightly construed, as they have been by the United States Supreme Court, are only intended to deny powers to the States and not to grant or enlarge the Federal powers. Under them the opposite party claim to do everything. We do not ask to undo the past, nor the work of the war. We take the country where the war left it and its situation now. The Constitution remains to us, and its amendments remain; but they furnish no authority for such bills as the present one. It is in the administration and legislation under the amendments that we find the usurper and the reconstructer who are dangerous to peace and the fomenters of anarchy. When we read in our authentic reports from both sides what has been done in Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, we can readily perceive the drift of this arraignment of bad government.

NO RETROGRESSION.

Neither am I to be placed, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] intimated the other day, in antagonism to the colored race. I disclaimed being responsible for Judge Van Trump's dictum in the minority Ku-Klux report. It is not a fair inference that I favored the abolition of colored suffrage and the oppression of the African. That protest was meant, so far as I know, to apply to the irrepressible social conflict between black and white, which is urged by party tricksters to keep the colored voters with the radicals.

I have already said here that New York State, on motion of a democratic Senator, anticipated action here, under the thirteenth amendment, by removing the property qualifications upon negro suffrage in New York. The Cincinnati and Baltimore platforms meant no reaction on this subject of enlarged suffrage. No one on any committee could or can reverse the action of our State and national conventions, which accepted, with Horace Greeley, the situation. Honest men then united to forget the past and advance the democratic party to its present condition. To-day they are more sincere in caring for the real interests of the lowly and colored than those who use them to their hurt and to the distress, impoverishment, and dishonor of southern people and State governments. The negroes will find out their friends. The democracy accepts the present condition of affairs in order to better them. It does not propose any retrogression.

The relations of slavery, the questions of civil war, the grief and grievances of that vast conflict, are or should be buried. Out of their graves spring new conditions and fresh responsibilities. The foremost duty is the satisfaction of the people in the new order, and the replacement of those guarantees of public security North and South, without which government, like that in Louisiana, is little less than anarchy. The party in power obtained it by crying "Peace, peace," but they give no peace. They made their ricketty scaffolds of reconstruction. The South ventured on them. Radicalism has already, by fraud and force, tried to hack them down. The South is to have no peace until it lays itself at the feet of radical spoliation and annoyance, and forgets all of its manhood in its abject obeisance to the social Mumbo Jumbo. Unless it does so, the whole country is to be racked with the suspension of habeas corpus and the threats of civil war. In fine, and under specious pretexts, the war is to be renewed for ulterior purposes. What those purposes are, time will determine. What such bills as this mean the people of New York, who are, every election, blessed with Federal supervisors and their paid minions, know full well. It is my purpose now to enter my earnest protest as well against the swash and swagger of the military and its insolent domination over civil rights and interests, as against the espionage of paid Federal supervisors over all our elections. It was to be hoped that such discussions as this were long since over; but, sir, the question recurs:

IS THE MILITARY SUPERIOR TO THE CIVIL AUTHORITY?

One of the peculiarities of these times is that the conservators of the established order in this country are compelled to discuss and discuss again the fundamental questions, long since the foregone conclusions of our best men. We have to go to the alphabet of freedom. In 1840 the whig party denounced Poinsett's scheme of a standing army, which, compared to our present armies, was as the mole-hill to the mountain. But no one objects to this jealousy of military power unless he be a despot or his tool. This jealousy of the supremacy of the military over the civil authorities took form in our constitutions. It springs from the training of the Anglo-Saxon mind for a thousand years. A distinct military order was always regarded by our ancestors as dangerous in a land of liberty. When, therefore, we are to have again scattered over the States where war does not exist hundreds of shoulder-straps and thousands of soldiers, in camp, in barracks, in hotels, what will follow? It is easy to see that under this bill we shall have again those army sheriffs, the provosts. They will again sneak into our assemblages to carry on an espionage for those in power. We are to have in every congressional district extra constitutional commissioners or supervisors. Again civilians are to be dragged from quiet homes by soldiery to be tried by drum-head rules. In such a prospect, let us go back to the origin of civil liberty and reproduce the rudiments.

It is laid down by certain writers that in absolute monarchies the safety of the prince requires a great military establishment. This is required on the principle of fear. Monarchs govern more by fear than love. This seems to be the doctrine of the present Administration. In England, when it was necessary to raise a force in time of war, the leaders were elected by the people, to make them responsible to those whom if they injured they could account unto for their misdoings. Blackstone says, (book 1, chapter 13:)

Because of their great power these officers were elected by the people in their full assembly or folkmote, in the same manner as sheriffs were elected; following still that old fundamental maxim of the Saxon constitution, that where any officer was intrusted with such power as if abused might tend to the oppression of the people, that power was delegated by a vote of the people themselves.

This custom was inherited from the Germans. Out of this custom sprang the militia, the citizen soldiery, a system by which the discipline was made general and easy and the soldier mingled freely with the people. It is this conservative element by which the spirit of the people was communicated to the soldier and foreign and standing armies were rendered useless and innoxious. We want no soldiery in our States except that which is of the States. The second amendment of the Constitution took care to guard the States and their militia:

A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a State, the right of THE PEOPLE to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

The first article, eighth section, in enumerating the powers of Congress to call out the militia, expressly "reserves to the States the appointment of the officers."

MILITARY COMMISSIONS—ENGLISH PRECEDENTS.

Springing out of this old jealousy of military authority was the distrust of military commissions, like those which will assuredly follow the suspension of civil process and the suspension of habeas corpus. Blackstone calls all such elements of power "temporary excrescences bred out of the distemper of the State." This Administration and its servitors have sought in vain for pretexts to declare martial law, which, as Sir Matthew Hale said, was built upon no settled principles, but is entirely arbitrary in its decisions—in truth and reality, no law. The only justification for such a state of things is for discipline in the Army. It has no place in a community where courts remain and the civil law stands. Military commissions are the detestable fungus of a bad condition. The English people suffered from such creatures of despotism. The famous "petition of right," a part of the bible of English freedom, enacted that "no commission shall issue to proceed within this land according to martial law." They had felt the outrage of trying men other than by the law of the land and by a jury; and they even struck their kings down to break this infamous tyranny of the military. What is it but an unlimited power to create crimes and annex to them any punishments? It is legislation. It makes the executive the legislature. It makes a part the whole. The President is a part of the Legislature. He approves and vetoes laws; he cannot make laws nor suspend laws. One of the chief crimes of this Administration is that it has undertaken to do, nay has done, what the kings of England undertook to do—to suspend laws.

SUSPENSION OF THE LAW OF LIBERTY.

Allow me to cull some examples from English history for our guidance. History is written for our instruction, and it but repeats itself.

In England the laws of Parliament, unlike the laws of Congress, are paramount. Here the Constitution is the supreme law of the land; and any law made by Congress or State inconsistent with the Constitution is void. In England it is otherwise. If the President of the United States undertakes to legislate he usurps; if he undertakes, as he did in Louisiana, to suspend any part of the Constitution, from which he derives all his authority either as President or as Commander-in-Chief, he does just what James II did, and for which he lost his crown. The revolution of 1688 was grounded on the breach of the English constitution by the attempt of the monarch to suspend certain laws concerning religion. These laws of Parliament as to the English Church were intolerant, bad laws, and James sought to suspend them. On the 4th of May, 1688, he proclaimed that it was his "royal will and pleasure that from henceforth the execution of all and all manner of penal laws in matters ecclesiastical * * * is hereby suspended."

He ordered the bishops of the realm to have his proclamation read in all the churches. Seven bishops objected and protested—

That the declaration is founded upon such a dispensing power as hath often been declared illegal in Parliament and particularly in 1662 and 1672 and the beginning of your Majesty's reign, and is a matter of so great moment and consequence to the whole nation, both in church and state, that your petitioners cannot in prudence, honor, or conscience so far make themselves party to it as the distribution of it over all the nation.

For writing these noble words the bishops were imprisoned in the Tower. On the 29th of June, 1688, they were tried. I hold in my hand the volume of State Trials of Howell containing this most remarkable trial.

It might be well before stating further the results of the great trial to ask: Where will this authorized suspension of habeas corpus end, Mr. Speaker? The right to criticise and protest against the arbitrary suspension of this writ may itself be regarded as a crime. The lawyers of the bishops, Sir Robert Sawyer, "old Pollfexen," Pemberton, and others, placed their defense upon the fact that no English potentate had the right to suspend the law. No more moral right has the Executive or Congress to suspend habeas corpus, to override the militia of the States by Gatling guns or Sheridan's orders, to abridge free speech, free press, right of trial by indictment and jury, or to establish military commissions and inflict unusual punishment. If there were no dispensing power in the King, there was no seditious libel in the bishops. If a southern man tells the truth as to the tyranny of this Administration, he has been guilty of no crime. As Justice Powell said to the jury in the case of the bishops:

If the King can dispense, it amounts to an abrogation and repeal of all laws. If this be once allowed, there will be no need of Parliament; all the legislation will be in the King, which is a thing worth considering, and I leave the issue to God and your consciences.

The jury came into court on the 30th of June and found the bishops not guilty; whereat, says the report, "there were great shouts in court and throughout Westminster Hall." The shouting was regarded by Judge Jeffries, of infamous immortality, as indecent. Such shouting has not yet died away. The echoes of that shouting hailed William of Orange as the new King; and the same echoes are going on now and here, proclaiming, in answer to last fall's verdict of the free people of America, that there is to-day no cause or pretext to suspend our fundamental law, but that the Constitution "as it is" shall be regarded.

INDICTMENT OF HISTORY—EXCESSES OF POWER.

Mr. Speaker, these lessons of history as to the abrogation of fundamental law and the establishment of military codes will be unheeded by this Congress, but not by the American people. This bill will pass this House. It simply overloads our statutes with what Burke called an exuberance of mischief, unknown even to despotism. This side of the House, aided by some thirty gentlemen opposite, have done all they could to avert the great evil. For this, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has arraigned these republican lovers of liberty, with merciless irony. He charged them with taking their luxurious ease, while he and his band here struggled to fix upon the statute-book this monstrous law of intermeddling and coercion. I trust gentlemen are not to be deterred, by such an attack, from their whole duty to the end! If this bill becomes a law, what is the dire consequence? It will bring only a disorderly tyranny. The history of reconstruction, with its penalties and force, its frauds and spites, has been dark enough. It has been a tissue of folly, tumult, ruin, violence, and usurpation. It is a history "of eternal conspiracies worse than that of Greece." It does not banish Themistocles, but it banishes honesty. It does not starve Aristides, but it starves whole populations. It does not force Miltiades into exile or poison Socrates, but it does worse, it destroys States, and it exiles the people. "All the violence and wickedness by which a beginning power must acquire strength and all the weakness by which falling States are brought to complete destruction," are inaugurated in such measures as this.

If I might change somewhat a paragraph in a recent article from an English statesman and apply it to this measure, I would say: "The magistrate, after sacrificing order, peace, union—all the interests which it is his first duty to protect—for the alleged purpose of promoting liberty and justice, will be forced, after experience, to admit that he has really been promoting tyranny and wrong." The sounder the doctrines of such a magistrate the stronger are the arguments against the policy which deprives a good cause of its natural advantages.

WHERE IS THE RELIEF?

Mr. Speaker, history, economy, philosophy—in fine, all results from the experiences of mankind point to the fatal effects of such measures of force as this bill, while they point to the beneficent consequences of the policy of conciliation. Where and when are these direful consequences to cease? When and where are we to sound the glad tidings of individual brotherhood and State equality? Were our elections indeed a failure? Do we who oppose this bill not represent the moral though not the numerical majority of this House and in the grand total the voice and conscience of the people?

What relief, then, is there for the stricken South? Is it only in the appeal which one of old made in his great distress and so apposite to this time?

I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause: which doeth great things and unsearchable; marvelous things without number: He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness: and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong.—Job, v: 8, 9, 12, 13.

But how long, O, how long, are we to wait for this divine relief, and for the undoing of the crafty and froward? The voice of the people last fall remains unheeded. Radicalism still moves on here under the guise of legislation. She flaunts her black banner in our faces. She glories in her triumphs over the prosperity and happiness of our beautiful sunny South. The verses of one of our native poets fitly, though quaintly, describes the desolation which has followed her path:

A WASTED LAND.

She came, and with her hand,
With her mouth, yea, and her eyes,
She hath ravaged all the land;
Its beauty shall no more rise:
She hath drawn the wine to her lip
For a mere wanton sip;
Lo, where the vine branch lies;
Lo, where the drained grapes drip.

Her feet left many a stain;
And her lips left many a sting;
She will never come again,
And the fruit of everything
Is a canker or a pain:
And a memory doth crouch
Like an asp—yea, in each part
Where she hath left her touch—
Lying in wait for the heart.

[Joaquin Miller.

But the time is at hand when her career will be ended and the ravages of the spoiler shall cease. The wantonness of power is nearly over. The canker and pain, they too will soon cease. Patience, and moderation—moderation, moderation above all. Be true to these, gentlemen of the South, and before the gray dawn of the morning which ushers in the hundred years of our independence shall have passed, the States, all in unison and self-respecting and respected, will make according harmony.

CONCLUSION.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, it is the saddest of my reflections that the real remedy for these southern troubles, dangers, uncertainties—the one mode which you did not and do not employ was yet so simple, so obvious, so easy! The small humanity of concession, the cheap generosity of conciliation, would have accomplished all that your repressions and coercions have so signally failed to accomplish. There was discontent at the South, but it would have vanished before a policy of kindness such as you might honorably have adopted; or, if you could not be kind, if you had only let these stricken and brave people alone—severely, nay, even contemptuously alone! What was it that blotted out of existence the non-jurors who had kept England uneasy with their intrigues and rebellions for five convulsive reigns? It was not repressive legislation, for that was the pabulum and the inspiration of their existence. It was not persecution, for it was that upon which they chiefly throve. It was the cessation of persecution. It was the abandonment of pursuit. It was the complete, definite, final ignoring of restrictive laws, and the extension of amnesty so absolute as to be actually contemptuous that made voiceless these ancient and experienced trumpets of sedition. They had successfully held up against all the power of the Parliament and the Throne. They could not contend, they perished as suddenly as ephemera before the gentle yet withering zephyrs of contempt and silence! How long would these misguided southern youth have been likely to keep up their childish Ku-Klux masquerade, with its stupid ceremonial, its clumsy garb, and its night walking, but for the incentive of your frowns and the flattery of your restrictions?

One word more, sir, and I have done. We are not here any longer to ask, as we have so often done, for charity, for liberality, for mercy toward the South. We are here to demand justice, strict justice, necessary justice, and justice not only for the harried and suffering South, but justice for the whole suffering Union, that is growing leprous with the contagion which your acts have disseminated. The deadly virus is already in our veins, and we are in danger of being stricken down as the host of Sennacherib perished in a single night before the breath of the destroying angel. Save the South, sir, or the whole country will perish!

Mr. COBURN yielded to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. OBRIEN.]

[Mr. OBRIEN addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. COBURN. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. NUNN.]

Mr. NUNN. Mr. Speaker, I feel with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] who has just spoken the solemnity of this occasion. It is a solemn occasion, for in my judgment the life or death of hundreds, ay, of thousands, depends upon the passage or rejection of this measure. Not so much upon the fact that it is passed, as the immediate effect which will be produced. Let the people in the North and in the South only understand there is a power, that there is an authority somewhere to check these outrages and murders, and from that instant they will cease and there will be no further necessity for the execution of this law. If, on the other hand, you reject this bill you will give license to these wrong-doers to continue as they have done for years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care what are the reports of investigating committees in reference to affairs in the South. I do not go to Alabama with her bloody record, nor to Mississippi with her miserable Vicksburgh, nor to Louisiana with the bloody streets of New Orleans, but I have only to refer to my own State. In Tennessee, in my native State, almost at my own door, in the adjoining county, in my own district, if you please, the lives of sixteen men were taken, men who were hung, shot, or otherwise murdered. What was the result? We are told not one of these things ever was done except the parties were indicted in the State courts. But for what? Was it for murder? No, sir; but simply for wearing masks in the night-time. Masked men are roaming that country at large. It is not only so in that county, but turn to the adjoining county to the left of where I live. There two deputy sheriffs, clever, honest, intelligent gentlemen, whose honesty and independence nobody dare attack, were shot down.

A MEMBER. When?

Mr. NUNN. Last fall in Tennessee they were shot down and afterward died, and the sheriff himself is now a refugee from his own home.

A MEMBER. For what were they shot down?

Mr. NUNN. In attempting to make an arrest of men who had violated the law, men who had shot people the day before. As I have said the sheriff, a man than whom none more gallant and honorable lived anywhere, is to-day a fugitive from his home; and for what? Simply for the purpose of attempting to enforce the laws of the State of Tennessee. And what was the result? The republicans elected by from one thousand to fifteen hundred majority the sheriff of the county. A very short time afterward he was driven from his home and his deputies were murdered in the streets. The next election the democrats carried the county by a thousand majority.

When you pass this law you stop these outrages. There will be no necessity for its enforcement; because when they understand that these things have to be stopped and the power is vested in the President of the United States to stop them, then they will cease; otherwise they never will.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NUNN. I desire just one minute more.

Mr. COBURN. I cannot yield further. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask my colleague one question. Does he say that sixteen men were taken out of Gibson County and hung?

Mr. NUNN. They were hung, assassinated, or otherwise disposed of by the Ku-Klux.

Mr. ATKINS. Not a man of them was hung. Only five were shot, and the balance escaped.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let me ask this——

Mr. COBURN. I cannot yield further.

Mr. NUNN. Then I ask leave to print the remainder of my remarks. There was no objection.

Mr. TREMAIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. NUNN] a minute of my time.

Mr. NUNN. Whenever any proposition is made, whenever any measure is introduced to correct these outrages, when the President makes any effort in that direction, the cry is that the republican party wants Grant to be military dictator. Allow me to say here, Mr. Speaker, that I had rather see Grant, with the confidence I have in his ability, with the confidence I have in his integrity, and with the confidence I have in his patriotism, I would rather see him military dictator than see any man on earth President of the United States who would sit silently by and see the weak and the helpless trodden down and oppressed without attempting to stop it.

Mr. TREMAIN. Perhaps no more important question has been presented to this Congress or indeed to any American Congress than that which is involved in this bill. The friends of this bill regard it as a measure connected with a series of other measures on which they had hoped that the opinion of the House of Representatives might be obtained. The civil-rights bill was one of that series of measures. The judgment of this House upon the Arkansas case and upon the Louisiana case it was also hoped might be procured. And when, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] exclaimed that he was sorry that in the expiring moments of the House this question should be brought here, he could not have been ignorant of the fact that the reason why it has been delayed has not been owing to the friends of this bill.

We have, sir, struggled in season and out of season to bring these matters before the House. Every avenue has been closed except that which was opened by the committee whose reports were privileged; and when the unwritten history of these struggles comes to be known to the country it will be surprised at the obstacles which the friends of these measures have been compelled to encounter to bring them before the House.

The struggles to obtain the amendment of the existing rules when it appeared that such rules were capable of being so abused as to prevent all legislation; the repeated scenes of filibustering which have taken place in this House; the refusal of some of our republican members to suspend the rules, and the openly declared opinions and action of many of them adverse to any political action by this House upon the southern question—that issue which in my judgment is one of the most vital and important issues now pending before the American people—all these things attest the obstacles and difficulties under which the rank and file of the party have labored in their earnest efforts to procure affirmative, vigorous, and efficient action by the present Congress.

But, sir, I rejoice at last that there is an opportunity for us to make up a record. I rejoice, even if this bill shall fail, that those men, though they are the rank and file of the party, who have struggled to show the people that they have been desirous of doing something in regard to this southern question will have at least the poor privilege of putting their names upon the record in favor of this measure. And I hope too an opportunity may be afforded to express our views upon the other kindred measures with which this is so intimately identified.

Sir, I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] for giving me an opportunity to express my views upon this bill. I cannot attempt in the limited period allotted to me to discuss the general principles of the measure. I hope, however, to answer some of the objections which have been urged against this bill.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I hope and trust that the motion made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to strike out the first, second, and fourth sections of the bill will not prevail. The first two sections relate to a kindred subject, and may be considered together. The first is designed to protect a State government against a combination and conspiracy formed within the United States in an adjoining State to overthrow the government by unlawful, violent, and forcible means. The second section aims at the same objective point. It seeks to protect the State government against a conspiracy formed within the State by force and violence to overthrow that government. Both sections declare it to be an offense against the United States for such conspirators to overthrow and usurp or to attempt to overthrow and usurp such governments by forcible, violent, unlawful, and revolutionary means.

It is the duty of the Legislature to keep up with crime. Crime is ingenious and always in advance of existing criminal codes. Recent events have shown that combinations have been formed for the purposes against which this bill is aimed, and no legislation is found upon the Federal statutes adapted to such a case. It is the duty of prudent and wise legislators to keep pace, if possible, with the progress of crime by providing adequate means for its prevention and punishment. Sir, I trust there is no man on this floor who does not admit the wisdom and the propriety of some measure like the present, if we have the constitutional power to pass it, that it may protect the existing State governments.

Look at the city of New Orleans. On the 14th of September Mr. Penn, by an armed insurrection, overthrew by a preconcerted conspiracy the existing government of that State, and if it had not been in the power of the governor and lieutenant-governor of the State to appeal to the Federal Government there would have been no power on earth to secure the protection of the citizens of the State and to enforce the execution of their laws. Here was a conspiracy whereby several thousand armed men had prepared and perfected their lawless plans, and suddenly rising destroyed the lives of many peaceable citizens, took possession of the State-house by force, intimidation, and violence, and overthrew the existing government of the State. The governor appealed to the President for aid, and he responded. The soldiers then sent were present at the subsequent organization of the Legislature of Louisiana.

Sir, a few men in the United States service were sent upon the demand of the governor to preserve the peace, and it is because they were there that the scene transpired at the organization of the Legislature that shook this country from center to circumference. Who believes that if there be a law on the Federal statute-book to prohibit these offenses and make them punishable by Federal jurisdiction these offenses would have been committed. We know that organizations have been formed in some of the States to overturn the government; there are organizations in neighboring States to aid in that work. But, says the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] my worthy and esteemed colleague on the Judiciary Committee, we have not the constitutional power to do it. Have we not? What can be plainer than the power to authorize the protection and preservation by Federal power of existing State government in a State? Section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution declares that Congress shall have power—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

I now turn to the power of the United States in relation to the existing governments of the States, and it will be found in section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution, where it is declared that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

The moment a State becomes one of the family of the Union the ægis of the Federal Government extends over it and we are bound to protect it, and all the means that are necessary to accomplish that object are given to Congress. Congress is the exclusive judge of the degree of the necessity that exists and of the means that shall be employed.

In the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, quoted in 4 Wheaton, Marshall, the Chief Justice says:

If the end be legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may constitutionally be employed to carry it into effect.

If a certain means to carry into effect any of the powers expressly given by the Constitution to the Government of the Union be an appropriate, measure not prohibited by the Constitution, the degree of its necessity is a question of legislative discretion, not of judicial cognizance.

This fundamental rule of construction has never been departed from, but has been repeatedly sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States.

And yet we are told that although we have the power to admit a State into the Union, although we are bound to protect the existing government of that State, although we are obliged upon the application of the governor of that State, if it be invaded, or insurrection ensues, or domestic violence exists, to send all the military and naval forces of the Government to maintain it, yet, forsooth, we have not the power either by civil or criminal legislation to prevent the government so established from being invaded, usurped, or overthrown. I submit that such an argument as that scarcely deserves serious consideration. It is for us to judge whether protection is needed and what protection shall be accorded.

Now, the fourth section of the bill follows the line of precedent, precedent at all events of the republican party, and while it may be disregarded on the other side of the House, they should at least be respected on this side. In the acts of 1870 and 1871, passed by a republican Congress, and which were signed by a republican President, it was made criminal for State officers of registration to violate their duties as registration officers of the State where that violation of duty deprived the citizen of his right to vote for a Representative in Congress. I refer to the act of 1870, passed on the 31st day of May, and which will be found in the sixteenth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 145, where these duties were specially imposed on registration officers to have a fair registration under the laws of the States.

The twentieth section of that act is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if, at any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, any person shall knowingly personate and register, or attempt to register, in the name of any other person, whether living, dead, or fictitious, or fraudulently register, or fraudulently attempt to register, not having a lawful right so to do; or do any unlawful act to secure registration for himself or any other person; or by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer, or promise thereof, or other unlawful means, prevent or hinder any person having a lawful right to register from duly exercising such right; or compel or induce, by any such means, or other unlawful means, any officer of registration to admit to registration any person not legally entitled thereto, or interfere in any manner with any officer of registration in the discharge of his duties, or by any such means, or other unlawful means, induce any officer of registration to violate or refuse to comply with his duty, or any law regulating the same; or knowingly and willfully receive the vote of any person not entitled to vote, or refuse to receive the vote of any person entitled to vote, or aid, counsel, procure, or advise any such voter, person, or officer to do any act hereby made a crime, or to omit any act the omission of which is hereby made a crime, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall be liable to prosecution and punishment therefor, as provided in section 19 of this act for persons guilty of any of the crimes therein specified: Provided, That every registration made under the laws of any State or Territory, for any State or other election at which such Representative or Delegate in Congress shall be chosen, shall be deemed to be a registration within the meaning of this act, notwithstanding the same shall also be made for the purposes of any State, territorial, or municipal election.

Now, sir, we impose no new and additional duties upon the State officers by this Federal legislation than were already imposed by the laws of the State. The above section was amended in 1871 so as to read as follows:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That if [at] any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States any person shall knowingly personate and register, or attempt to register, in the name of any other person, whether living, dead, or fictitious, or fraudulently register, or fraudulently attempt to register, not having a lawful right so to do; or do any unlawful act to secure registration for himself or any other person; or by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer or promise thereof, or other unlawful means, prevent or hinder any person having a lawful right to register from duly exercising such right; or compel or induce by any of such means, or other unlawful means, any officer of registration to admit to registration any person not legally entitled thereto, or interfere in any manner with any officer of registration in the discharge of his duties, or by any such means, or other unlawful means, induce any officer of registration to violate or refuse to comply with his duty or any law regulating the same; or if any such officer shall knowingly and willfully register as a voter any person not entitled to be registered, or refuse to so register any person entitled to be registered; or if any such officer or other person whose duty it is to perform any duty in relation to such registration or election, or to ascertain, announce, or declare the result thereof, or give or make any certificate, document, or evidence in relation thereto, shall knowingly neglect or refuse to perform any duty required by law, or violate any duty imposed by law, or do any act unauthorized by law relating to or affecting such registration or election, or the result thereof, or any certificate, document, or evidence in relation thereto, or if any person shall aid, counsel, procure, or advise any such voter, person, or officer to do any act hereby made a crime, or to omit any act the omission of which is hereby made a crime, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall be liable to prosecution and punishment therefor as provided in section 19 of said act of May 31, 1870, for persons guilty of any of the crimes therein specified: Provided, That every registration made under the laws of any State or Territory for any State or other election at which such Representative or Delegate in Congress shall be chosen shall be deemed to be a registration within the meaning of this act, notwithstanding the same shall also be made for the purposes of any State, territorial, or municipal election.

The Federal Government finds certain officers clothed with certain powers, franchises, and privileges by the laws of the State which may place it in their power to deprive an elector of his right to vote for Representatives in Congress, and thus commit a Federal wrong. Congress is clothed with power to create and define new offenses. This fourth section simply declares that if a State officer shall willfully and corruptly avail himself of his official position to do this wrong he shall be subject to Federal jurisdiction. We punish him for the wrong he has done to a citizen entitled to vote for Representatives in Congress. The question of our right to enforce the execution of a State law is not involved. It is the corrupt obstruction of the right of the elector to vote for members of Congress which we punish. His baton of State authority, which enables him to do the wrong, we declare shall not exempt him from punishment. And that is all there is of this groundless objection. Our Constitution and Federal laws are declared to be supreme, anything in the laws of a State to the contrary notwithstanding. We do not attempt to do anything more except to say to these State officers, "You shall not use your power by a maladministration of it, not by mere nonfeasance but by willful and corrupt malfeasance, to deprive the elector of his right to vote for a Representative to Congress; you shall not willfully and corruptly withhold the certificate of registration authorizing him to vote; you shall not by artifice and fraud prevent him from registering."

This fourth section is in these words:

SEC. 4. That in case the registration officers appointed under the laws of any State or Territory, where by the laws of said State or Territory registration is required as a condition of voting at any election for Representatives in Congress, shall willfully or corruptly refuse or neglect to give any persons entitled to vote at any precinct or voting place established under the provisions of the laws of Congress or of any State or Territory, full and sufficient opportunities to register in the manner prescribed by law and within the time fixed by law, or shall, by any device or subterfuge, impose conditions or enforce discriminations upon voters or classes of voters not declared in such registration laws, or shall refuse or neglect on request made by the voter or his agent to furnish such voter with a certificate of registration or such other form of evidence of the same as may by law be required in such State or Territory, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will my colleague allow me——

Mr. TREMAIN. I have no time to be interrupted, or I would be glad to answer any and all questions. The Federal Government acts upon the individual. When an individual is clothed by a State with the power to deprive a citizen of the right to vote, we say to him, "If you use that power willfully and corruptly, you shall be subject to Federal jurisdiction." The Constitution gives to Congress the power to prescribe all the regulations necessary in the judgment of Congress to carry on an election of Representatives in Congress. Section 4 of article 1 declares that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations." The registration proceeding may well be considered as a regulation of the election, and this House has express power to make such regulations.

The whole subject is confided to Congress. Does not the greater include the less? We say to the State officer, "When you assume a duty in regard to the election of Representatives in Congress, you shall not so discharge that duty as to be guilty of depriving a citizen of his right to vote." We further say that if that individual has possession of certain powers and privileges he shall not use them to the prejudice of electors of members of the House of Representatives. This officer is charged with certain duties affecting both the State and Federal sovereignties, and by accepting the position he cannot divest himself of all control over his action of the superior power, or protect himself from responsibility by the plea that he is a State officer.

Now in regard to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. I am satisfied with this bill as it was reported by the committee. I want no limitation as to territory. And why? Because the bill carries its own limitations with it, and the language of this habeas corpus suspension in this bill is precisely the same with the language contained in the act that was passed by Congress known as the Ku-Klux act, and which will be found on pages 14 and 15 of volume 17 of the Statutes at Large, except that we bring in two cases prescribed by the first section of this bill, and say that where there is a rebellion, arising under this section as well as under the general provisions of the bill or otherwise defined, so powerful that the local authorities cannot control it, the power to suspend the writ shall be given. The law of 1871, known as the Ku-Klux law, is as follows:

SEC. 4. That whenever in any State or part of a State the unlawful combinations named in the preceding section of this act shall be organized and armed, and so numerous and powerful as to be able, by violence, to either overthrow or set at defiance the constituted authorities of such State and of the United States within such State, or when the constituted authorities are in complicity with, or shall connive at, the unlawful purposes of such powerful and armed combinations; and whenever, by reason of either or all of the causes aforesaid, the conviction of such offenders and the preservation of the public safety shall become in such district impracticable, in every such case such combinations shall be deemed a rebellion against the Government of the United States, and during the continuance of such rebellion, and within limits of the district which shall be so under the sway thereof, such limits to be prescribed by proclamation, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, to the end that such rebellion may be overthrown: Provided, That all the provisions of the second section of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, which relate to the discharge of prisoners other than prisoners of war, and to the penalty for refusing to obey the order of the court, shall be in full force so far as the same are applicable to the provisions of this section: Provided further, That the President shall first have made proclamation, as now provided by law, commanding such insurgents to disperse: And provided also, That the provisions of this section shall not be in force after the end of the next regular session of Congress.

Let us read section 13 of the present bill:

SEC. 13. That whenever in any State, or part of a State, the unlawful combinations named in section 5299 of the Revised Statutes, and in the first and second sections of this act, shall be organized and armed, and so numerous and powerful as to be able, by violence, to either overthrow or set at defiance the constituted authorities of said State and of the United States within said State, or when the constituted authorities are in complicity with or shall connive at the unlawful purposes of such powerful and armed combinations; and whenever, by reason of either or all of the causes aforesaid, the conviction of such offenders and the preservation of the public safety shall become in such district impracticable, in every such case such combinations shall be deemed a rebellion against the Government of the United States, and, during the continuance of such rebellion, and within the limits of the district which shall be so under the sway thereof, such limits to be prescribed by proclamation, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, to the end that such rebellion may be overthrown: Provided, That all the provisions of the second section of the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, which relate to the discharge of prisoners other than prisoners of war, and to the penalty for refusing to obey the order of the court, shall be in full force so far as the same are applicable to the provisions of this section: And provided further, That the President shall first have made proclamation, as provided by law, commanding such insurgents to disperse.

It will be seen that there are two limitations provided for in this section, the one being the existence of such a powerful insurrection as to overpower the State and Federal authorities, and the other the proclamation of the President declaring upon his official responsibility the existence of such rebellion.

But inasmuch as some gentlemen desire to have it limited, and inasmuch as our investigating committees have been confined to the four States named in the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] I shall have no objection to adopting his amendment. If we cannot have all we want, we will take what seems to be more agreeable to others.

But I see no difficulty in the way of suspending the writ of habeas corpus where, first, there is a rebellion so strong that the local State and United States authorities cannot overcome it; and, second, where the President, acting under the responsibility of his office, and being liable to impeachment for failure of duty or misconduct in office, shall issue a proclamation declaring that that state of things does exist within the territory to which the proclamation shall apply. Now, I could vote cheerfully for this bill substantially as reported by the committee, with the modifications suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts who sits near me, [Mr. BUTLER.] Those modifications are merely to make plain what I think was sufficiently plain before, that this suspension shall be limited to the insurrectionary districts; and I have no objection to limiting it as to time. Then the question comes back for us to determine, do we believe that a state of things exists which renders it proper and expedient to pass this law?

I admit that there is unfortunately a difference of opinion among gentlemen on this side of the House. I concede to those who differ with me the same sincerity which I claim for myself and for the friends of this bill. But if they could see this subject from the stand-point we see it from, I am sure they could not withhold their support from this bill. We cannot shut our ears against the testimony that comes up from the South; we cannot shut our ears against the appeals made by Representatives on this floor of four millions of emancipated freedmen asking us for protection of lives, property, and their political rights; we cannot shut our eyes and ears against the testimony coming from these investigating committees.

It seems to me that we are drifting toward a second rebellion, and that some of our sentinels and officers charged with the protection of the rights of the people are sleeping at their posts of duty. The question is, shall we apply our powers of legislation to prevent existing evils and wrongs, or shall we finally resort to bayonets and war? I see what in my judgment are most plain indications that we are drifting towards the maelstrom of another rebellion. In no other way can I understand this concerted destruction of human life, these organizations of white-leaguers throughout the South, these organized bands of banditti throughout the States lately in rebellion, seeking to obtain political power not by fair argument, but by force and violations and fraud, without regard to the wishes of the people.

And here I desire to say that when the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] of the minority of the committee, who spoke yesterday, quoted from the Republican, he in fairness should have quoted a little further. When that paper stated that one object of this bill was to preserve the electoral votes of certain States to the republican party, he ought to have read the further statement that there were at least nine of those States in which upon a fair and honest election a majority of the electoral votes would be in favor of a republican President. With that qualification we are willing to say that such is one of the objects of the bill. Its primary object, however, is the protection of the rights of the people, the preservation of law and order, and the protection of the ballot-box and its purity. It is to secure to men who have been emancipated and to their political friends the right to enjoy the elective franchise. "If this be treason, make the most of it." For one I will say (because I may have no other opportunity to say it, and gentlemen have gone out of their way to express their views on these other questions) that I am willing to take all the odium and all the responsibility that may follow from the declaration I make here and now, that while I would that the state of things now existing did not exist, yet believing that it does exist, I think we should be false to ourselves and false to our duty if we did not seek to secure the fruits that have been won by such sacrifices of blood and treasure.

I say further that if I have an opportunity to vote upon the question I shall be compelled to vote against the resolution submitted by my esteemed colleague on the Judiciary Committee [Mr. POLAND] in regard to Arkansas. I shall vote, if I have the chance, in favor of the declaration that Joseph Brooks was elected governor of that State, and that the constitution of Arkansas of 1868 has never been abrogated; that the present constitution is a mockery, a fraud, and a delusion. If I have a chance I shall vote with pleasure for the resolution submitted by the committee from Louisiana declaring that William P. Kellogg is the governor de facto of that State and that the arm of the President should be upheld and supported, let the consequences be what they may. "If this be treason, make the most of it." "Let justice be done though the heavens fall."

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. BECK, Mr. LAMAR, Mr. MOREY, Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. PELHAM, Mr. PAGE, Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. COMINGO, Mr. SMITH of New York, Mr. PARKER of New Hampshire, and Mr. SWANN obtained leave to have remarks printed in the RECORD as part of the debate on the pending bill.]

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to suggest that leave be granted generally to all gentlemen who may desire it to print remarks in the RECORD, with the understanding that nothing unparliamentary or of a personal character shall be inserted in the speeches.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. RANDALL. Every member ought to be on his honor in that respect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL?]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not think there should be a general license to write out speeches to be printed. I do not wish to be understood as objecting in the case of any member who may rise and ask the privilege of printing remarks which he has prepared for this occasion but has no opportunity to deliver. I think, however, it would be a very bad precedent to adopt a general order of the kind suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COBURN. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK.]

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted to me in this debate it will be impossible to enter upon a discussion of the several sections of this bill. I shall therefore confine myself principally to the examination of the provisions of the thirteenth section, authorizing the President to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

The second paragraph of section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States reads:

> The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

Now I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the authority thus conferred upon Congress is not only limited to cases of actual rebellion or invasion, but that the rebellion or invasion must be of such character as to put in peril the public safety. It is not sufficient alone that a rebellion or an invasion is apprehended, but such a state must actually exist and be of such magnitude as to threaten the national compact and the Constitution itself. And in this connection I call the attention of the House to the discussion which occurred in the House of Representatives in 1807, on the bill which had passed the Senate authorizing the President, Thomas Jefferson, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. The proposed legislation grew out of the troubles then existing known as the "Burr conspiracy. The Senate sent the bill to the House on the 26th of January, 1807. And a full discussion took place, participated in by some of the leading members of the House. In that debate, Mr. Elliott, a member from the State of Vermont, among other things, asks—

> Have we a right to suspend it in any and every case of invasion and rebellion? So far from it, that we are under a constitutional interdiction to act unless the existing invasion or rebellion in our sober judgment threatens the first principles of the national compact and the Constitution itself. In other words, we can only act in this case with a view to national self-preservation. We can suspend the writ of habeas corpus only in a case of extreme emergency; that alone is salus populi, which will justify this lex suprema.

In a speech delivered on the same bill by Mr. Eppes, a member from the State of Virginia, he says:

> It is not in every case of invasion nor in every case of rebellion that the exercise of this power by Congress can be justified under the words of the Constitution. The words of the Constitution confine the exercise of this power exclusively to cases of rebellion or invasion where the public safety requires it.

And further on in the same speech he says:

> I consider the provision in the Constitution for suspending the habeas corpus as designed only for occasions of great national danger. Like the power of creating a dictator in ancient Rome, it prostrates the rights of your citizens and endangers public liberty.

In the same discussion Mr. R. Nelson, a member from the State of Maryland, speaking of the Burr conspiracy, which in the debate had been denominated a rebellion, says:

> But admit that it is a rebellion; will every rebellion justify a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus?

And after quoting the clause of the Constitution authorizing the suspension, proceeds to say:

> Does, then, the public safety require this suspension? Does the Constitution justify it? And under present circumstances, confining a man in prison without a cause. There is no danger; the enemy is not at our door; there is no invasion; and yet we are called upon to suspend the writ of habeas corpus.

I also desire to call the attention of the House to the speech delivered during that discussion by Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia. He said:

> My view of the subject is this: that the privilege can only be suspended in cases in which not merely the public safety requires it, but that the case of the public safety requiring it must be united with actual invasion or actual rebellion.

And further on he says:

> For myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I will not grant this power at any time, except under the most imperious necessity, and I say this without any disrespect to this honorable body or to any of the public functionaries. Take man as he is, and in his best estate you find him an animal prone to abuse and corruption. There does not exist a single constitution or law in the world that does not enforce this salutary truth.

The result of the discussion on the question, "Shall the bill be rejected?" was—yeas 113, nays 19.

The defeat of the bill by so large a majority, as well as the discussion to which I have called the attention of the House, shows how unanimous was the opinion of the Representatives of the people at this early day that this great writ of liberty should be preserved in its full integrity and should not be suspended except under the most imperious necessity. And now let me inquire whether there exists to-day a state of actual rebellion or invasion in any section of the Republic? I do not believe any gentleman will deliberately maintain that such a state of affairs exists. On the contrary we know well that peace extends throughout our borders; that in every State the execution of the laws is unobstructed, and the courts are in the full and complete exercise of their powers.

But, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that if it was a fact that either invasion or rebellion existed in some quarter of the Union, yet this would not warrant the passage of this bill unless the public safety was thereby put in great peril. But in a time of peace, without any threat of rebellion or invasion, this dangerous and extraordinary measure is pressed upon the House. It is only adapted to a state of war. It arms the President with power which would be dangerous in the hands of the purest and most eminent statesman of any age. I would be unwilling in the present condition of the country to intrust this alarming power in the hands of any man, and certainly my repugnance to do so is greatly increased when it is proposed to place this power in the hands of a distinguished military chieftain.

Mr. Speaker, there is no danger of rebellion or invasion which today threatens any of the States or the peace and quiet of the Republic. I know that the provisions of this bill are intended to apply especially to the people of the Southern States. But, sir, what is the condition of the people of these States? Impoverished by the results of the late war. Laboring to restore themselves and their States again to prosperity. In good faith yielding obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, they desire nothing more ardently and sincerely than a true and lasting peace and that restoration between themselves and the people of the several States of mutual confidence and regard for each others rights which is due from all of the citizens of this Union to each other. And I ask is it just, is it fair and reasonable that you should place upon the statutes of the nation a measure like this, a deliberate declaration of a want of confidence in them and of their good faith to the Union?

Shall we by the passage of this bill subject these people to the charge of nursing treason in their midst? Or that they contemplate rebellion or invasion against the States, or that we are again on the eve of civil war? It seems to me that no thoughtful man, on a full consideration of the true condition of these people, can entertain a well-founded apprehension that they contemplate the commission of either of these great wrongs.

I implore gentlemen to pause before they adopt this measure. True statesmanship would require that we should labor earnestly to heal the wounds caused by the late unhappy and destructive war, and as far as possible restore that feeling of mutual confidence and affection without which there can be no real union among these States. The passage of this bill can only produce mischief, and probably serious oppression and wrong, and would establish a dangerous precedent in our history.

The privilege of this great writ of habeas corpus cannot be too highly prized, or guarded with too much vigilance by a free people. The history of the noble struggle made by the people of England, who fought and suffered to achieve and establish it, the sacredness with which it has been secured and transmitted to us by the wise men who have gone before us, should warn us of our duty in preserving unimpaired a right so sacred and so invaluable to the preservation of the rights of a free people.

Mr. COBURN. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, the hour for argument has passed. I rise in the closing moments of this debate but for a single purpose. The bill before the House has for its object the protection of the lives, the liberty, and the property of American citizens—nothing more.

There is at this time in a portion of the country a disturbed condition of affairs, and this bill is intended to reach and remedy that condition. It would be wholly unnecessary, even if time permitted, to enter upon an extended examination of the evidence establishing the great disorder in the Southern States which would seem to make necessary the passage of this law.

In addition to the voluminous report of the Ku-Klux outrages, filling thirteen volumes of recorded crime, we have the report of several committees just laid before the House fully confirming these outrages. But I cannot enter into detail. I may be permitted, however, to lay before you portions of the documents accompanying the President's message to the Senate of the 13th of January last, which would seem to call for some action on the part of the legislative branch of the Government and give some idea of the condition of affairs in the Southern States. I will ask the Clerk to read the following from the President's message and accompanying documents:

> To put this matter beyond controversy I quote from the charge of Judge Woods, of the United States circuit court, to the jury in the case of The United States vs, Cruikshank and others, in New Orleans, in March 1874. He said:
> "In the case on trial there are many facts not in controversy. I proceed to state some of them in the presence and hearing of counsel on both sides; and if I state as a conceded fact any matter that is disputed, they can correct me."
> After stating the origin of the difficulty, which grew out of an attempt of white persons to drive the parish judge and sheriff, appointees of Kellogg, from office, and their attempted protection by colored persons, which led to some fighting, in which quite a number of negroes were killed, the judge states:
> "Most of those who were not killed were taken prisoners. Fifteen or sixteen of the blacks had lifted the boards and taken refuge under the floor of the courthouse. They were all captured. About thirty-seven men were taken prisoners. The number is not definitely fixed. They were kept under guard until dark. They were led out, two by two, and shot. Most of the men were shot to death. A few were wounded, not mortally, and, by pretending to be dead, were afterward, during the night, able to make their escape. Among them was the Levi Nelson named in the indictment.
> "The dead bodies of the negroes killed in this affair were left unburied until Tuesday, April 15, when they were buried by a deputy marshal and an officer of the militia from New Orleans. These persons found fifty-nine dead bodies. They showed pistol-shot wounds, the great majority in the head, and most of them in the back of the head. In addition to the fifty-nine dead bodies found, some charred remains of dead bodies were discovered near the court-house. Six dead bodies were found under a warehouse, all shot in the head but one or two which were shot in the breast.

"The only white men injured from the beginning of these troubles to their close were Hadnot and Harris. The court-house and its contents were entirely consumed."

To hold the people of Louisiana generally responsible for these atrocities would not be just; but it is a lamentable fact that insuperable obstructions were thrown in the way of punishing these murderers, and the so-called conservative papers of the State not only justified the massacre, but denounced as Federal tyranny and despotism the attempt of the United States officers to bring them to justice. Fierce denunciations ring through the country about office-holding and election matters in Louisiana, while every one of the Colfax miscreants goes unwhipped of justice, and no way can be found in this boasted land of civilization and Christianity to punish the perpetrators of this bloody and monstrous crime.

On the 14th of October eighty persons signed and published the following at Shreveport:

"We, the undersigned, merchants of the city of Shreveport, in obedience to a request of the Shreveport campaign club, agree to use every endeavor to get our employés to vote the people's ticket at the ensuing election; and in the event of their refusal so to do, or in case they vote the radical ticket, to refuse to employ them at the expiration of their present contracts."

On the same day another large body of persons published in the same place a paper, in which they used the following language:

"We, the undersigned, merchants of the city of Shreveport, alive to the great importance of securing good and honest government to the State, do agree and pledge ourselves not to advance any supplies or money to any planter the coming year who will give employment or rent lands to laborers who vote the radical ticket in the coming election."

Permit me to refer also to some portion of the report of General P. H. Sheridan:

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI.
New Orleans, January 4, 1875.

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that unless something is done to give protection to the people all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to the laws and the murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest.

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished.

The city is very quiet to-day. Some of the banditti made idle threats last night that they would assassinate me because I dared to tell the truth. I am not afraid, and will not be stopped from informing the Government that there are localities in this department where the very air has been impregnated with assassination for several years.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General, Commanding.

NEW ORLEANS, January 10, 1875.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington. D. C.:

Since the year 1866 nearly thirty-five hundred persons, a great majority of whom were colored men, have been killed and wounded in this State. In 1868 the official record shows that eighteen hundred and eighty-four were killed and wounded. From 1868 to the present time no official investigation has been made, and the civil authorities in all but a few cases have been unable to arrest, convict, and punish perpetrators. Consequently there are no correct records to be consulted for information. There is ample evidence, however, to show that more than twelve hundred persons have been killed and wounded during this time on account of their political sentiments. Frightful massacres have occurred in the parishes of Bossier, Caddo, Catahoula, Saint Bernard, Saint Landry, Grant, and Orleans. The general character of the massacres in the above-named parishes is so well known that it is unnecessary to describe them.

The isolated cases can best be illustrated by the following instances, which I take from a mass of evidence now lying before me of men killed on account of their political principles. In Natchitoches Parish the number of isolated cases reported is thirty-three; in the parish of Bienville the number of men killed is thirty; in Red River Parish the isolated cases of men killed is thirty-four; in Winn Parish the number of isolated cases where men were killed is fifteen; in Jackson Parish the number killed is twenty; and in Catahoula Parish the number of isolated cases reported where men were killed is fifty, and most of the country parishes throughout the State will show a corresponding state of affairs. The following statements will illustrate the character and kind of these outrages. On the 30*th of August,* 1874, in Red River Parish, six State and parish officers, named Twitchell, Divers, Holland, Howell, Edgerton, and Willis, were taken, together with four negroes, under guard to be carried out of the State, and were deliberately murdered on the 29*th of August,* 1874. The White League tried, sentenced, and hung two negroes on the 28*th of August,* 1874. Three negroes were shot and killed at Brownsville, just before the arrival of the United States troops in this parish. Two white-leaguers rode up to a negro cabin and called for a drink of water. When the old colored man turned to draw it, they shot him in the back and killed him. The courts were all broken up in this district and the district judge driven out.

In the parish of Caddo, prior to the arrival of the United States troops, all of the officers at Shreveport were compelled to abdicate by the White League, which took possession of the place. Among those obliged to abdicate were Walsh, the mayor; Rapers, the sheriff; Wheaton, clerk of the court; Durant, the recorder; and Ferguson and Renfro, administrators. Two colored men, who had given evidence in regard to frauds committed in the parish, were compelled to flee for their lives, and reached this city last night, having been smuggled through in a cargo of cotton. In the parish of Bossier the White League have attempted to force the abdication of Judge Baker, the United States commissioner and parish judge, together with O'Neal, the sheriff, and Walker, the clerk of the court, and they have compelled the parish and district courts to suspend operations. Judge Baker states that the white-leaguers notified him several times that if he became a candidate on the republican ticket, or if he attempted to organize the republican party, he should not live until election.

They also tried to intimidate him through his family by making the same threats to his wife, and when told by him that he was a United States commissioner, they notified him not to attempt to exercise the functions of his office. In but few of the country parishes can it be truly said that the law is properly enforced, and in some of the parishes the judges have not been able to hold court for the past two years. Human life in this State is held so cheaply, that when men are killed on account of political opinions the murderers are regarded rather as heroes than as criminals in the localities where they reside and by the White League and their supporters. An illustration of the ostracism that prevails in the State may be found in a resolution of a White League club in the parish of De Soto, which states "that they pledge themselves under (no!) circumstances after the coming election to employ, rent land to, or in any other manner give aid, comfort, or credit to any man, white or black, who votes against the nominees of the white man's party."

Safety for individuals who express their opinion in the isolated portions of this State has existed only when that opinion was in favor of the principles and party supported by the Ku-Klux and White League organizations. Only yesterday Judge Myers, the parish judge of the parish of Natchitoches, called on me upon his arrival in this city, and stated that in order to reach here alive he was obliged to leave his home by stealth and after nightfall, and make his way to Little Rock, Arkansas, and come to this city by way of Memphis. He further states that while his father was lying at the point of death in the same village he was unable to visit him for fear of assassination, and yet he is a native of the parish, and proscribed for his political sentiments only.

It is more than probable that if bad government has existed in this State, it is the result of the armed organizations, which have now crystallized into what is called the White League; instead of bad government developing them, they have by their terrorism prevented to a considerable extent the collection of taxes, the holding of courts, the punishment of criminals, and vitiated public sentiment by familiarizing it with the scenes above described.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

The following is from the platform adopted by the White League in Saint Mary on the 13th of July:

"We enter into and form this league for the protection of our own race against the daily-increasing encroachments of the negro, and are determined to use our best endeavors to purge our legislative, judicial, and ministerial offices from such a horde of miscreants as now assume to lord it over us.

"That to accomplish this end we solemnly pledge our honor to each other to give our hearty support to all that this league may determine by a majority of votes cast at any regular meeting, and to aid to the utmost of our ability in carrying out such measures as it may adopt.

"That we do not reject or condemn any white man for his political opinions so that he join us in the one grand object we may have in view."

The following is from the platform of the White League, adopted at Alto on the 11th of July:

"That we regard it the sacred and political duty of every member of this club to discountenance and socially proscribe all white men who unite themselves with the radical party; and to supplant every political opponent in all his vocations by the employment and support of those who ally themselves with the white man's party; and we pledge ourselves to exert our energies and use our means to the consummating of this end."

The following resolution was adopted at the White League convention at Franklin on the 1st of August:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that every member of the White League organization is in honor and duty bound zealously to support and vote for each and every regular nominee of the organization, to the exclusion of all other candidates or persons whatever."

The following is from the Enterprise of the 6th of August, published at Franklin, Saint Mary Parish:

"We ask for no assistance; we protest against any intervention. * * * We own this soil of Louisiana, by virtue of our endeavor, as a heritage from our ancestors, and it is ours, and ours alone. Science, literature, history, art, civilization, and law belong alone to us, and not to the negroes. They have no record but barbarism and idolatry, nothing since the war but that of error, incapacity, beastliness, and crime. Their right to vote is but the result of the war, their exercise of it a monstrous imposition and a vindictive punishment upon us for that ill-advised rebellion.

"Therefore are we banding together in a White League army, drawn up only on the defensive, exasperated by continual wrong, it is true, but acting under Christian and high-principled leaders, and determined to defeat these negroes in their infamous design of depriving us of all we hold sacred and precious on the soil of our nativity or adoption, or perish in the attempt.

"Come what may, upon the radical party must rest the whole responsibility of this conflict, and as sure as there is a just God in heaven, their unnatural, cold-blooded, and revengeful measures of reconstruction in Louisiana will meet with a terrible retribution."

The following is from the Shreveport Times of July 9:

"If a single hostile gun is fired between the whites and blacks in this and surrounding parishes, every carpet-bagger and scalawag that can be caught, will, in twelve hours therefrom, be dangling from a limb. We do not say this in a spirit of braggadocio; we say it in the interest of peace, and we know what we are talking about."

Mr. Speaker, I have asked this much of the President's message to be read, as bearing upon the condition of affairs in one portion of the South, and tending to show the spirit and temper of the people.

But we are told to-day, and I have heard it repeatedly charged on the floor of this House, that the Federal Government under the administration of the republican party is the guilty author of all these outrages, of all this wrong, of all this persecution at the South. It is to this, and to this only, I desire to direct my reply. Sir, I may be permitted to say also that I am prompted to this reply in no small degree by the remarkable speech of my colleague, [Mr. WILLARD,] a speech delivered in this House last evening, which I do not believe reflects the sentiment of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. He admonished us that a decade had passed since the cessation of armed hostilities without bringing to the country harmony and peace, and then proceeds to arraign the republican party as the author of this discontent. It is true, sir, a full decade has gone by since the overthrow of armed resistance to Federal authority; yet it is past contradiction that in many portions of the South there has not been an hour since of substantial peace, not a moment when the sacred right of life, liberty, or property has been either respected or secure. Wrongs the most cruel, ostracism the most malignant, crimes the most revolting, revolutions the most unprovoked, conspiracies the most monstrous, persecutions the most relentless, riots the most bloody, and murder most foul, have characterized this era of southern repentance and returning loyalty.

Sir, I am fearful, if the history of the South for the last ten years could be written in all its horrible details, it would present one of the bloodiest pages in the peaceful annals of the civilized world. Where does the responsibility for this rest? Who is the author of these unblushing crimes? These are pertinent inquiries. These are questions for us to answer before we can apply the proper remedy. Is it the Federal Government or the white man's party of the South, aided by northern democracy, which has brought upon the South all her woes?

Although it is admitted that this disorder is confined entirely to the Southern States, we are nevertheless told that the South is in no way responsible for it; that the South has accepted the situation in good faith; but that the Federal Government under the control of the republican party has been and is an instrument of unbridled tyranny. No words of denunciation are too severe, no language too bitter and intemperate, no malediction too terrible to fitly characterize the Federal Government in its dealings with the late rebellious States, while at the same time the people who were lately in arms against the Government are paraded as examples of patient suffering and heroic endurance worthy the imitation of martyrs.

Sir, I am not surprised that the democratic party of the North should continue to arraign that party which was made the object of its bitterest denunciation when we were struggling for the Nation's life; but it is a matter of profound astonishment that any Southern man can be found to take up the cry.

Never in the history of the world was there such an exhibition of magnanimity as that manifested by the Federal Government in its dealings with the Southern States. Southern chivalry should be prompt to recognize it. How can you say you have been dealt with tyrannically? Have you forgotten that in 1861 the Federal Government prostrated itself in the very dust, begging you to stay the fratricidal blow, and offered every measure of compromise consistent with the honor of the nation and the union of the States? Have you forgotten, in 1863, while the Government stood warding off with one hand the blow aimed at the nation's life, that in the other it held out to you a proclamation of almost universal amnesty? Have you forgotten the renewed proffer of pardon in 1864-'65-'67? Have you forgotten that on the 4th of July, 1868, the executive head of this nation proclaimed and declared "unconditionally and without reservation to all persons who participated in the rebellion full pardon and amnesty for the offense of treason?" Have you forgotten the generous terms of surrender at Appomattox? Have you forgotten that every seceded State has been received back into the Union with full restoration of all its rights? Have you forgotten that not a single man who participated in that conspiracy has ever paid the penalty of his treason? Do you forget that day by day measures for the removal of political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment pass this House unchallenged and unquestioned? Do you forget that we have welcomed back to places of profit and power the very men who were chiefest among the conspirators? Nay, more, do you forget that in the next Congress which assembles in this capital city there are to be more leaders of the confederate than of the Union forces sitting in this Hall? And yet, sir, in the face of all these facts, you persist in your denunciation of that power to which you are indebted for the greatest blessings of life.

And now, sir, how has this leniency on the part of the General Government been received? The gentleman from Kentucky tells us that the people of the South have accepted the situation in good faith, and there is no obstacle in the way of national peace except such as interposed by the National Government. How, sir, have you accepted the situation? It is true you have disbanded your armies, but only to organize the Ku-Klux and White Leagues, oath-bound to secret murder. You have abandoned your warfare against an armed nation only to strike down unseen defenseless citizens. You have accepted the abolition of slavery and the liberty of the black race only to attempt his enslavement by a system of vagrant laws which, if executed, would consign that people to a servitude no less terrible than slavery itself. You have accepted the citizenship of the black man only to declare that "this is a white man's government." You recognize his right to the ballot only to make the use of it by him so perilous as to endanger his life and property. You have sheathed the bloody sword of open revolt only to draw the bloodier dagger of the assassin. You have quenched the leaping fires of revolution only to light the more desolating torch of the incendiary.

Such has been your "acceptance of the situation" and such the condition of affairs in the Southern States. And now what more do you ask? You stand here and demand that every Federal soldier shall be withdrawn from the borders of the Southern States; that every carpet-bagger shall abandon his new home in the South and every scalawag be driven from your States. Pardon the use of these terms; they are the coinage of a repentant and reconstructed South. For one I stand here as a republican to protest against the acceptance of peace upon any such conditions, feeling that the nation cannot so dishonor itself.

What offense has this Federal soldiery committed? They are conservators of the peace; they are not Ku-Klux or white-leaguers; they drive out no citizens from the States; they whip no schoolteachers; they kidnap no legislators; they demolish no schoolhouses; they burn no churches; they have done no murder. And so long as used to protect the most sacred rights of American citizenship I shall not deplore its existence. The Federal Army is objectionable to the South because it disturbs massacres, interferes with riots, prevents revolutions, disperses mobs, intimidates white-leaguers, guards churches and school-houses, and fills with wholesome fear the men who plot against the peace of the State and the life and property of the citizen. A soldiery thus used is offensive only to men who are plotting treason.

And who are these scalawags whose presence cannot be endured? They are the men who have renounced their adherence to the lost cause and have sworn a fresh allegiance to the country and the flag. In that renewed fidelity I demand for them the amplest protection. But it is demanded of us that all carpet-baggers shall abandon the Southern States. Who are these carpet-baggers? They are the men who fought the country's battles and saved the nation's life, and when the war was over made their homes in the Southern States. If there are those from the North who have settled among you solely for the purpose of eating out your substance and plundering the people, they deserve the execration of all good men and shall receive no defense from me. But those carpet-baggers who when the war was over settled in the South in good faith as their future home must be protected in life and property. They are the men who took up your dishonored flag on yonder heights and carried it to victory; they are your brothers and sons who bore it in triumph from Cairo to the Gulf, and brought it back floating over a nation protected and a Republic saved; they are the men who waded through that hell of fire at the Wilderness, and planted it in triumph over the field of Appomattox. And I say for one, sir, that, come what may, though it take the strong arm of the Federal Government, they shall be protected in all the rights of American citizenship wherever that flag of my country floats.

One word more and I am done. If you will pardon me, I say it in all kindness, men of the South, there is a road to peace. I tell you, too, there is but one road. In it lies a peaceful solution of all our difficulties. Whether you pursue it is a matter of your own free choice. It is a highway on which if you will but walk you will find speedy and enduring peace and unexampled prosperity. Men of all parties even my colleague [Mr. WILLARD] can walk on it, for it is obstructed by no constitutional doubts, but is paved by the Federal compact. May I point you to it? Behold it here.

Strip the hideous masks from your outlawed Ku-Klux; disband your White Leagues; visit swift and condign punishment upon your unarrested and untried felons, and enforce State and Federal law with a firm hand. Give to human life some security and to property protection; recognize the equality of all men before the law, and their right to its fullest guardianship; put out the fires of your burning churches and school-houses; make the freedom of the ballot so secure that there shall be no intimidation; let free speech be recognized; let ostracism be unknown; renew your allegiance to the Government; extend a generous welcome to northern labor and northern capital; abandon all hope of the lost cause. In a word, "accept the situation" in good faith and in the highest sense, and you will have a peace universal. Do this, and your barren fields will stir with a new life; your desolate cities will echo with the hum of returning industry; your spacious harbors will choke with the tide of commerce. Do this, and the whole South will spring from her baptism of blood into the fullness of a new life, redeemed and regenerated forever. All hail that auspicious day!

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

The message also announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. STEVENSON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a privileged question. I submit the report of the committee of conference, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 3818, an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, report that the said committee have been unable to agree.

JAMES A. GARFELD,
STEVENSON ARCHER,
HENRY H. STARKWEATHER,
Managers on the part of the House.

LOT M. MORRILL,
AARON A. SARGENT,
HENRY G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio what was the point on which the conferees on the part of the two Houses were unable to agree?

Mr. GARFIELD. I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that after five conferences covering a great many hours the conferees on the part of the two Houses have failed to agree upon this legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. There were about ninety amendments involved in the difference between the two Houses. The conference committee agreed upon all of them except the single item relating to the clerks at our desk. The Senate committee withdrew the proposed increase of pay for their own officers and asked us to do the same. The committee on the part of the House felt themselves as far instructed as any committee of conference can well be on that subject and declined to assent to the arrangement, and on that point alone a disagreement has resulted. I submit this statement to the House for their understanding of the matter, and then the House can take such action as they deem best.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think the gentleman has omitted to state some matters of disagreement. There were other important amendments made to the bill by the Senate involving an increase of the appropriations by several hundred thousand dollars. It is true an effort was made to get to a result on all these amendments. It is also true that two members of our committee were not satisfied to agree to the large increase of appropriation made in other parts of the bill amounting to several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. COBURN. I call for the regular order; I do not think this is right or in good taste.

Mr. GARFIELD. The question of taste is perhaps a matter of judgment with one member as well as another. I ask that the report of the committee of conference be adopted and that a new conferance be ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.) This is a privileged question.

Mr. ARCHER. I wish to say that so far as the House committee was concerned we readily acceded to the amendment of the Senate so far as it went to the increase of the compensation of their officers. But when the question of the compensation of our officers came up the Senate flatly refused to recede from their amendments reducing the pay of our officers.

The question was taken on discharging the committee of conference and asking for the appointment of a new committee; and it was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. GARFIELD, Mr. PARKER of Missouri, and Mr. SPEER as the committee of conference on the part of the House.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the security of elections, &c.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States is a government of limited powers, but within the limits of its jurisdiction its grants are ample and its power supreme. The occasion and the manner of the exercise of these powers rest alone in the discretion of the department of the Government in which it is vested by the Constitution. An express grant carries with it the implied power to do whatever is necessary to effectuate the purposes of the grant. In interpreting a constitutional provision when the language is plain and unambiguous, construction can neither enlarge nor diminish its import.

Section 4, article 4 of the Federal Constitution makes it the duty of the United Stated to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. Guarantee means "to undertake to secure to another at all events." The United States is then bound to secure to each State a republican form of government at all events. This is the first and leading, and controlling idea of this section, and is limited by the specific cases enumerated in the subsequent clauses of the section. The duty of guaranteeing to each State a republican form of government is imposed upon the United States, and with it is necessarily implied the power to use whatever means Congress may think necessary to accomplish that object. From whatever source danger may be apprehended, Congress may provide against it and against every form of danger to its republican form of government. Congress may protect it were it otherwise.

If it be held that Congress can intervene against domestic violence when aimed at the republican form of government in a State only when applied to by its Legislature or its executive, then it might be that from the unwillingness of these, or their omission to make the application to the United States, the people of the State would be unprotected in their republican form of government, or in a war of factions in a State the republican form of government might be overturned and a different form of government established. This principle would in a very possible contingency work out the destruction of State governments republican in form, and in time work the destruction of the Government of the United States as well.

The Government of the United States was framed upon a very careful review and consideration of the history and forms of all popular governments which had preceded it, and it is not conceivable that the framers of the Constitution could have overlooked the destroyer of them all—not foreign war, but intestine strife; not enemies from without, but enemies from within. This guarantee of a republican form of government to each State was not only a protection to the people of the State, but was also a security to the people of all the States and of the United States. It was a guarantee of our free institutions and republican form of government. If this be true, then it is clear that Congress has the power to protect by punitive laws the republican form of government in the States from the two forms of violence to which the disturbed condition in the South has shown them to be liable, invasion from other States and violence and force within their own limits, which are provided for in the first and second sections of the bill.

An objection has been made to the second section that it constitutes treason against the State, and that it gives to the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. Treason is levying war against the State, or adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort. This is a statutory offense enacted by the act itself, defined by it, and upon its face different from treason, having a wider scope, and providing for the punishment of grave offenses which would not constitute treason, and for the suppression of serious evils which cannot be reached by the laws against treason.

The fourth section of the bill is objected to because it is said that this is a punishment proposed by an act of Congress for the violation of a State law. This is an entire misconception of the idea upon which the section is based. Its provisions relate to elections of Representatives to Congress, and is intended to secure the fair exercise to the people of a right conferred by the Constitution of the United States. Section 2, article 1, makes qualified electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature electors for choosing Representatives to Congress. This section only proposes to enforce good faith in the State officers in States where registration is made a prerequisite for voting, and to secure those entitled by the Constitution of the United States to vote for Representatives in Congress protection in the exercise of that right against the negligent or fraudulent conduct of State officers whose duty it is to afford them opportunities to register as required by law.

The bill has been characterized by its opponents as the "force bill," and has been the object of much bitter denunciation. It is stigmatized as a party measure, conceived in the interests of the republican party, and proposed to be enacted for the maintenance of its ascendency. That these charges are untrue will be evident to the candid and intelligent mind upon reading the bill. The offenses enumerated in the bill all good men will condemn, and every citizen who respects law and order will approve of their suppression. To invade a State for the purpose of violating its laws or overthrowing its government; to conspire to usurp a State government or to seize it by force; to intimidate voters at elections by the use of fire-arms; to destroy ballots or ballot-boxes, are all of them offenses, both moral and political, which any one will admit should be forbidden and repressed.

The provisions compelling registrars to do their duty in allowing voters to register and the appointment of deputy marshals and supervisors in elections of Representatives to Congress are right in themselves, and if not necessary, are certainly not of a character to call down such heavy condemnation as has been heaped upon this bill. The reasons for the opposition to this bill are deeper than is expressed and different from what appears upon the surface.

The need of these enactments has developed itself in the commotions in the South which resulted from the war and the desperate struggles of the democratic party South to overturn practically the reconstruction acts of Congress and the amendments to the Constitution which establish the civil and political equality of all men and to reinstate themselves in power in all of the Southern States. This they could not do by a fair election, because in many of these States, embracing all of the cotton States, the majority of voters were opposed to the democratic party, and if allowed to vote the democrats would be defeated. This made it necessary to resort to fraud and force to prevent the colored people, who are nearly all of them republicans, from voting, and to prevent their votes from being counted when they were cast.

Two of the most effectual modes of accomplishing this are fire-arms or other deadly weapons and the destruction of ballots and ballot-boxes. The democrats arm themselves with ease and conspire readily, and on the day of election, at precincts where there are large numbers of colored and but few white republicans, get up some difficulty between white and colored men, which is the pretense and the signal for a general attack by the whites with fire-arms, killing some, wounding more, and driving the remainder from the polls. This has been done and repeated so often that instances of it need not be named. It is a part of a systematic and extended plan of operations practiced with relentless cruelty and with proportionate success in the interest of the democratic party in the South.

Another mode is to destroy or make way with the ballots and ballot-boxes at precincts where there are large republican majorities, and by this means secure the return of democratic candidates contrary to law and the will of the people.

At Springhill, in Barbour County, Alabama, in the fall elections of 1874, to get possession of the ballot-box which contained a large majority of republican votes, the democrats, after extinguishing the lights—it being just after dark—attacked the United States supervisor, Judge Keils, fired a great many shots at him, they being in the same room with him, killed his son, a youth of seventeen, at his side, then took the ballot-boxes and destroyed them, and the democracy then claimed, the evidence of the vote at that precinct being destroyed and consequently not counted, that they had carried the county.

In Wilcox County, Alabama, upon an election for judge of the court of quarter sessions in 1871, a republican and democrat were candidates; the republican a high-toned gentleman, a good lawyer, and well qualified; the democrat a nominal lawyer, and very indifferently qualified. The county was republican by two thousand majority, and it was known that the republican candidate was elected, but the result had not been declared. By the laws of Alabama the boxes containing the ballots are sent from the several precincts to the judge of probate at the county seat, and are then counted out and the election declared. Five of these ballot-boxes were stolen from the judge of probate's office, after being returned, on the night before the day for counting out, and the consequence was the votes in them were lost and the democrat was declared elected.

I could mention many others, but these examples are enough to show the necessity of the provision in the bill with regard to ballot-boxes. The propriety as well as necessity of the section providing for United States supervisors, who shall supervise the election and canvass and declare the vote, is forcibly illustrated in the late election for members to Congress in Alabama, in the following table, which I present and shall embody in my remarks as printed in the RECORD:

List of votes by counties at election in Alabama November, 1874, for Congressman at large.

* In this county a box containing some thirteen or fourteen hundred republican votes was thrown out by the county supervisors and not returned to the secretary of state, and is therefore not included in the table.

The two columns on the left show the vote in the State in the general election in 1872, in each county. The next two columns show the reserve of each party, based upon the census of 1870, which did not vote in 1872. The next two columns shows the vote for Congressman at large in 1874. The next two columns show the increase of the vote of 1874 over the vote of 1872, and the next two columns show the excess of voters in each county over and above the vote of 1872, and the reserve added to it, which would embrace the entire vote in the county.

There is no immigration into Alabama; on the contrary, there is a large emigration from it annually. Democratic policy there is driving out people instead of bringing population into the State. It is stifling all enterprise, suppressing all industries, shrinking all values, and everything wilts under its baneful influence. The exodus from the State more than equals the number who had arrived at the voting age in the two years from 1872 to 1874. So that it is fair to estimate the number of voters as about the same. Were this not true, the increase in particular localities, where the democrats had the control of the ballots and poll-lists, is so large as to preclude any hypothesis, but that the increase was the result of fraudulent voting, while the increase in nearly all of the white counties is such as to demonstrate that it was the result of a widely extended and deliberately concerted plan to carry the election by fraud.

I mention a few counties to illustrate the fraud by which the State was counted for the democracy when it in fact voted for the republican ticket by several thousand majority. In the county of Blount the excess of the democratic vote over their entire vote in 1872 was 550, and this in a county which has only 1,800 votes in all. In Cherokee County, which has an aggregate vote of about 2,000, the increase of the democratic vote in 1874 over the entire democratic vote in 1872, including its reserve vote, was 1,005. In Coffee County, which has a voting population of only 1,081, the democratic vote in 1874 was 1,383. Three hundred over the entire vote in the county, and an increase of 442 votes over the entire democratic vote, including the reserve, in 1872. In the county of Jefferson the aggregate vote of the county is 2,269, and the excess of the democratic vote in 1874 over the entire democratic vote in 1872, including its reserve, was 953. In the county of Lee, in which the aggregate vote is 4,607, the excess of the democratic vote in 1874 over their entire vote, including their reserve, in 1872, is 1,561. In the county of Lee there was a box containing some thirteen or fourteen hundred republican votes, at Opelika, which was thrown out by the supervisors under the pretense that the box was illegal.

These votes do not appear in the table I have presented, which was furnished me by the secretary of state; and as they were not returned to him he could not estimate them in making out the vote. These added to the vote in the table, which was returned, make the republican vote in the county larger than it was in 1872, and show that the large excess of democratic votes did not come from republicans voting the democratic ticket. The counties I have named are counties in which the democracy had the control of the ballot-boxes, and they are sufficient to show the frauds by which the aggregate result was reached and the State carried for the democracy. The footing up of the entire vote shows that in the last election the democrats voted 17,113 votes more than they had in the State; in other words, that this party which arrogates to itself all the decency and all the intelligence, which boasts and swaggers over its chivalrous honor, manufactured over 17,000 votes to carry the election in Alabama

In contrast with this, I wish to call attention to the fact that the excess of the republicans in the State was only fourteen hundred and fifty-eight, not more than the reasonable rate of increase in two years. The vote as declared by the returns to the secretary of state for the democrat who received the largest vote for Congress at large was 106,009; for the republican, 92,884. The difference was 13,125 votes. Take from this the 17,113 fraudulent votes which were counted for the democratic candidate, and the republican was elected by 3,988 votes. But to this should be added the votes cast at Opelika and at other places which were improperly thrown out by the supervisors, which show that the republican ticket in Alabama was elected by some six thousand majority, and that they were counted out by fraud.

These are the men and this the party who have impressed the easy credulity of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] with the belief that they are the innocents, who have been wronged and defrauded by those villainous radicals in Alabama. Who ever heard of radicals in Alabama lying in wait and shooting men on the highway or in their own houses in the night-time for exercising that first and highest privilege of a freeman to think and act in accordance with the dictates of his own conscience and guidance of his own judgment upon political subjects? I might go further, and defy him or the democracy in Alabama to show an instance in which the republican party, as a party, have been guilty of frauds in Alabama.

That gentleman tells the House that the election law of Alabama does not provide against frauds. I am confident that the gentleman has never read the election law of Alabama. If he had, he would never have made the assertion. The law does provide against fraud, and in a greater variety of forms I fully believe, than any election law of any other State in the Union. As chairman of the judiciary committee of the house of representatives of the General Assembly of Alabama I drew that election law—every paragraph, sentence, and syllable of it. There were upon my committee distinguished members of the democratic party of Alabama, one of them now a judge of the supreme court, another the speaker of the present democratic house of representatives, and another the present democratic secretary of state; and not an objection was made to the law, nor an amendment proposed in committee, nor was there an amendment proposed by any democrat in the house, and only one slight amendment in the senate, which was democratic at the time. The only amendments proposed were by republicans, and these after some discussion were withdrawn, and the bill as it came from the committee, with the exception of the one amendment in the senate and another not of much importance proposed by myself, was passed and became a law. So far from the democrats objecting to the law they were anxious to have it passed.

These facts, well known to men of both parties, I mention to show the groundless character of the charges made by the democracy South against the republicans, and the facility with which they impose upon democratic members of congressional committees who are sent there to investigate the condition of affairs. If they make the gentleman believe that the election law for which all their representatives voted was a republican device gotten up to encourage and shelter frauds, it is not difficult to conclude that they would induce him to believe whatever else they wished. What surprises me is, that the honorable member did not read the law, which any of his democratic lawyer friends in Alabama could have furnished him, for himself. This, it occurs to me, would have been the best means of forming a reliable opinion on the subject. As it is, the gentleman (no doubt honestly) has made a mistake, and the injurious consequences of that mistake it is beyond his power to recall.

From these remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, which, no matter how much to be regretted, are perhaps only on the line which in these excited times must be expected from a political opponent, I turn to address myself with very different emotions to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] a good republican and political friend. Such I know him to be from his past record and antecedents. But had I known nothing of his former history, and had come into this Hall while he was speaking this evening, I should have taken him to be a politician of the opposite stamp. Neither the sentiments nor the principles which he uttered or the spirit that breathed them are in consonance with republicanism, as I understand and feel it to be.

The republican party is not willing to go back upon its own work of reconstruction, upon the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, nor upon its own glorious record, cemented with blood, its proud achievements crowned with success, upon its honored living and its mighty dead, upon the great leading and fundamental principles of free popular governments, the civil and political equality of all men. Nor is it willing to say to the poor victims of injustice and wrong in this free land that this great Government of ours, of which we are and have been so justly proud, the production of the great and good men who framed it, lauded by historian and statesmen, poet and philosopher, moralist and divine, throughout the civilized world, that it cannot protect its own citizens upon its own soil; that it claims, under the penalties of treason, paramount allegiance of all, yet it cannot render the reciprocal protection which allegiance implies, and which alone can render that allegiance a possible thing.

This Government, says the gentleman from Connecticut, with apparent sadness and sincerity, is imperfect. Perhaps he is mistaken. I would commend him for his own comfort, if he will allow the suggestion, to deliberate longer before settling down into this mournful conclusion. He has studied the Constitution much; let him study more, especially let him study in the light of the issues that brought on the war, and his true heart and ingenuous mind will gather new inspiration and expand with higher convictions and stronger faith as he penetrates the fullness and depth of its all-sufficient provisions and wondrous adaptations.

The illusion of State rights which has been so fatal to our country, which is in this new land where with unprecedented opportunities for success, we are testing the great experiment of man's capacity for self-government, the evil genius, which perpetually is breeding the elements of that destruction to us which it has brought upon all other republics, which has involved us in one civil war, and saturated our land with blood shed in fratricidal strife, surviving the ravages which it inflicted, is now raising itself under the euphonious title of "home rule," in form more specious and dimensions more formidable than when it shook the nation to its center with the convulsions of war. This was what induced the southern democracy to accept the nomination and platform of the Greeley party in 1872. Under it they raised the same clamor against the General Government as a centralized despotism, which had been leveled by these advocates of State rights against it for forty years before the war. The same role is now being enacted as in 1860, and will produce like results. They traveled the road once; its end was lost in the then distant future, just as its end is now unseen; but having traveled the road once, should we not be satisfied with the bitter experience of the past, without again treading its perilous pathway?

The danger to our country is not in centralization, but in decentralization. The people are under our form of government the sources of all power; their rulers are but their servants. They will never give up their power until it is wrested from them, and no one man can take it from them. No power can take it from them except themselves. Faction and strife and wars of faction against faction are the agencies through which republics have fallen and despotism has arisen upon their ruins. Disintegration, not centralization, has destroyed all the confederacies of ancient and modern times which have passed away. All past experience warns us. The specters of republics and confederacies once great and glorious as ours is now, rise amid their ruins, and point us to the Nemesis of discord which struck down their greatness and extinguished their glory; and yet with an infatuation that would seem incredible had it not been so often repeated in the fatal round of human frailty, we are nursing the same demon of destruction whose remorseless fury has consumed all the free popular governments of the past.

It is by the peculiar advocates in our country of this dangerous doctrine of home rule and disintegration that we are told that it is dangerous to liberty to give to the President the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in communities where lawlessness and violence reign; where the law is trampled under foot and crime, red with the blood of the helpless and defenseless, goes unpunished and unrebuked; where it is openly avowed that the laws and Constitution of the United States shall be made dead letters upon the statute-book, and that the freeing of the negro was a declaration of war between the Caucasian and the African, which must go on relentlessly until one or the other is exterminated.

In order that I may not be suspected of exaggeration upon these two points, I read extracts from democratic papers in Alabama in the late campaign, which I might multiply from other States, showing the precise issues which were presented to the people:

"There is no half-way ground; we must meet the issue fairly and squarely, and we must go either with the white man's party or the negro man's party."

The Birmingham News copied the above and commented as follows:

"This is emphatically our platform, and we have always stood firmly on it. * * * The republican party assumes as a fundamental truth that the negro is capable of civilization, and that his ignorance and brutality were caused by the tyranny and misrule of the dominant race. We believe every word of this to be false. * * * Emancipation threw the whites and blacks on their own resources, and each race must depend upon its own inherent strength. Freeing the slaves was a declaration of war between the Caucasian and African—a war that is going on now and that will go on silently, ruthlessly, and unceasingly until one or the other is exterminated. * * * Let us recognize facts, admit that a war of races is progressing, and then every man will range himself under the banner of his kindred. For ourselves we say, no compromise, no 'unification,' but a white man's rule, a white man's civilization, and a white man's government, or ruin and extermination!"—Eutaw Whig.

The rights guaranteed by the State and Federal Constitutions do not frighten us in the least. We do not expect to repeal any of the recent enactments. They may stand forever; but we intend, by superior intelligence, stronger muscle, and greater energy to make them dead letters on the statute-book. We intend to beat the negro in the strife, the warfare, the unending battle for life, and defeat means but one thing—extermination!—Birmingham News.

This, then, instead of being a force bill, is a bill to maintain the supremacy of the laws and Constitution of the United States; to protect free suffrage and to give effect to the will of the majority of the people as declared by fairly-conducted elections; to suppress and to punish crimes and give peace and security to all the people of the Southern States. These will be its direct effects, and its indirect but no less certain results will be to extinguish the kindling fires of another attempt at rebellion or the ascendency of that party from whose political dogmas sprang the purposes and practices of southern-rights politicians in 1860-'61—dogmas opposed to the theory upon which the war was waged by the republican party, and which constitute the new foundations upon which an extended Constitution rests as the results of the war.

We are in the midst of dangers which involve the existence of the Republic. The country has passed victoriously through the war, but it may be that the vessel which outrode the storm may founder in the reactionary swell of the commotions which have succeeded it. If the same devotion to your country's welfare inspires your minds as did the men of 1861, and the same nerve and decision mark your action, then all will be well; and under the guidance and control of the same party which preserved it from former perils, improved and purified by recent experiences, the Republic, rising above the dangers which threaten it, will start forth anew, quickened and invigorated, upon a great and glorious future.

Mr. COBURN. I yield the balance of my time——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time remaining. His hour has been in fact about an hour and a quarter.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the resolution of the House to print the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill(H. R. No. 4730) providing for the payment of certain employés of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the following joint and concurrent resolutions:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) to provide for the preservation of the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses; and Resolution of the House for printing the report of the Smithsonian Institution for 1874.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the following concurrent resolutions, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolution of the House for printing the annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1874; and

Resolution of the House for printing Professor Hayden's annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1873.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, &c.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate upon this bill has terminated. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 13, line 20, after the words "habeas corpus," insert "in such insurrectionary district or districts wherein the President deems such powerful and armed combinations to exist, within the limits of either of the following-named States: Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, or Alabama."

Also a new section, add the following:

SEC. 14. The provisions of section 13 of this act shall continue to be in force for and during the term of two years, and from thence until the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 91, noes 71.

Mr. BELL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LYNCH. Is this question susceptible of division?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 99, not voting 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cessna, Chittenden, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Stephen A. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barber, Barrere, Biery, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Dobbins, Eden, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Kendall, Lamison, Mitchell, Nesmith, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Pike, Potter, Pratt, Sloss, Small, Alexander H. Stephens, Strawbridge, and Charles R. Thomas—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. COTTON stated that his colleague, Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, was unavoidably absent from the House.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. PIKE, who would vote in the affirmative, while he himself would vote in the negative; also, that his colleague, Mr. SMALL, was paired with Mr. NIBLACK, and while Mr. SMALL if present would vote in the affirmative, Mr. NIBLACK would vote in the negative.

Mr. SLOAN stated that his colleague, Mr. FREEMAN, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. ALBRIGHT stated that his colleague, Mr. BIERY, was detained from the House by sickness, and if present would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. CESSNA. O, no; there is only one more vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 98.

Mr. BECK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CLEMENTS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 78, nays 171, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—171.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Barrere, Bland, Buffinton, Carpenter, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cox, DeWitt, Dobbins, Eden, Farwell, Foster, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Hays, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Lofland, Mills, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Potter, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, Alexander H. Stephens, Strawbridge, and Charles R. Thomas—38.

So the House refused to take a recess.

Mr. BECK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to take a recess.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BECK. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I make the point of order that this is a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. What is the motion?

Mr. BECK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. That clearly would never be in order without regard to the new rule.

Mr. BECK. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. Does not the rule still continue?

The SPEAKER. What rule?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The rule in reference to dilatory motions.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have had one since this question has been pending, one motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. When?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Since the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. When?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have heard about twenty since that time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman's logic is good the House could never adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They can get out of session when they desire.

The SPEAKER. On what ground does the gentleman ask the Chair to rule out the motion to adjourn? There has been no motion to-day to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If this is the only one, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. There is no possible mode of excluding the motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is clearly a dilatory motion.

Mr. STONE. I demand tellers.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it according to the rules of the House for members to pair off and absent themselves, leaving the House without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House know nothing about pairs; there is no recognition of them anywhere.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is there any privilege in it?

The SPEAKER. None at all. No duty can be evaded by a pair.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts Then I hope the republicans will not pair with the democrats, so as to leave us without a working majority.

The SPEAKER. It belongs to a personal and not to the parliamentary relations of members.

Mr. CESSNA. When will the House meet if the question is decided in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. On Monday, at eleven o'clock.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 75, nays 167, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Morrison, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Potter, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—167.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Atkins, Barrere, Biery, Burleigh, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Eden, Finck, Freeman, Giddings, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Houghton, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Loughridge, McCrary, Mills, Mitchell, Neal, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Pike, Randall, James C. Robinson, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, J. Ambler Smith, Stone, Storm, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, and Wolfe—45.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. VANCE said: The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STORM, is paired with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. DONNAN. If they were here Mr. STORM would vote "ay," and Mr. DONNAN would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CESSNA.) The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON] to strike out the thirteenth section as amended.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask that the section, as amended, may be reported.

The section, as amended, was read.

The question being put, there were ayes 72.

Before the negative vote was counted,

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My inquiry is this: Is the question on striking out the thirteenth section as amended?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is. The Chair so announced it.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 130, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Farwell, Finck, Foster, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Kasson, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, James W. McDill, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Poland, Potter, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—130.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barrere, Biery, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Dobbins, Eden, Fort, Freeman, Gunckel, Robert S. Hale, Havens, Hendee, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Loughridge, Mitchell, Morey, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Pike, Rainey, James C. Robinson, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, William Williams, and Wolfe—36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. CONGER. I think the question cannot be understood. I do hear responses from the other side of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The chair has several times announced that the question is on striking out the thirteenth section as amended.

Mr. TODD. I make the point of order that during the roll-call members have no right to be at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CESSNA.) The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I see no member at the Clerk's desk but the Speaker.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BUCKNER said: I make the point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] who is now at the Clerk's desk has no right to be there during the roll-call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have as much right here at the Clerk's desk as the Speaker has.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair and said: On what ground does the gentleman say that?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On the ground that I am a member of the House and so is he when he is not in his seat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has no right to interrupt the roll-call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have not interrupted anybody.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has a perfect right to remain at the desk.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. So have I the same right.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has no assigned seat on the floor of the House; but if he chooses to leave the chair for recreation it is not for the gentleman from Massachusetts to tell him where he shall stand. The gentleman from Massachusetts has no right to violate the rules of the House in this way. The Chair now calls the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] to the chair.

Mr. CESSNA here took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; when the gentleman is out of his seat as Speaker he has no more right than I have to be at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BLAINE, (the Speaker.) I have a right to stand where I choose, and the rule forbids you to stand at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And forbids you.

Mr. BLAINE. It does no such thing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ARCHER. I object to any interruption of the roll-call, and I make the point of order that it is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair reserves the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] if he insists on it, until after the roll-call is completed. The point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] is sustained.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair has just entertained two points of order while the roll-call was going on, and the Speaker has taken the Chair twice to interrupt the roll-call.

Mr. SPEER. I object to the interruption of the roll-call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will save the gentleman from Pennsylvania that trouble, and will not entertain anything about this personal matter.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have nothing personal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appeals to gentlemen to be seated and preserve order.

The Clerk resumed the roll-call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, returned to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. STORM. I make the point of order against the gentleman from Massachusetts that he has no right to be at the Clerk's desk, because members on this side of the House have been called away from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair has just entertained a point of order against me that I was at the Clerk's desk, although he refused to entertain my point of order against the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule that the Speaker of the House was not out of order, for the reason that he has no assigned place on the floor of the House.

Mr. BARRY. I want to know if we have two Speakers?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not entertain any further points of order during the roll-call.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I desire to state that on this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PIKE; if present he would vote "no," while I would vote "ay."

I desire to state also that Mr. NIBLACK is paired with my colleague Mr. SMALL; if here Mr. NIBLACK would vote "no," and Mr. SMALL would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL, (having voted "no" when his name was called.) I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to strike out the thirteenth section of the bill as amended.

Mr. COBURN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. SPEER. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAGE. Is not that a dilatory motion?

Mr. HYNES. Can the vote just taken be reconsidered after the previous question has been ordered and before it is exhausted?

The SPEAKER, (having resumed the chair.) The previous question will be exhausted only on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HYNES. Just so.

The SPEAKER. Then would the gentleman propose to reconsider an amendment to the bill?

Mr. HYNES. No.

The SPEAKER. Then you could not reconsider it at all.

Mr. HYNES. I submit the point of order for the Chair to rule upon, and will submit to his decision.

The SPEAKER. There is no point to rule on at all.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. COBURN; and there were—yeas 133, nays 111, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Danford, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Foster, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Kasson, Kellogg, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Phillips, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, J. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Strait, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—111.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barrere, Biery, Chittenden, Clinton L. Cobb, Dobbins, Eden, Freeman, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Havens, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Kelley, Kendall, Lamison, Lamport, Loughridge, Lowndes, Mitchell, Niblack, Orr, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Rainey, Schell, Isaac W. Scudder, Sloss, Small, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Wheeler, and William Williams—43.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the roll-call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask to have read the rule on page 234 of the Manual, so as to avoid any further controversy about this matter hereafter in regard to persons standing at the Clerk's desk.

A MEMBER. Is it in order to interrupt the roll-call?

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read, as it relates directly to the roll-call.

The Clerk read as follows:

In taking the yeas and nays on any question, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically. And while they are being taken, no member or other person shall visit or remain by the Clerk's table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. "Or other person;" he is the fellow I was after.

Mr. BLOUNT. On this question my colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is paired with Mr. LOFLAND. If present my colleague would vote "no," and Mr. LOFLAND "ay."

Mr. ST. JOHN. I am paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. SCHELL. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. LANSING. My colleague, Mr. LAMPORT, has been compelled to leave the House on account of sickness. If present he would vote "ay" on this question.

Mr. CLEMENTS. My colleague, Mr. BARRERE, has been detained from the House during the day by illness. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PIKE. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no." My colleague, Mr. SMALL, is paired with Mr. NIBLACK. If present Mr. SMALL would vote "ay," and Mr. NIBLACK "no."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to strike out the first, second, and fourth sections of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. STONE. That is right.

Mr. SHANKS. Let us adjourn until Monday, and not go over so far. Let us have Sunday to go to church, and then we can come here on Monday and attend to business.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the Chair hold that such a motion can be made, it being manifestly a dilatory motion?

The SPEAKER. The rule says that pending any question the Speaker can entertain only two dilatory motions. The question pending is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] The Chair is not allowed to rule out a motion even if in his judgment it be dilatory, because the rule permits two dilatory motions to be made.

Mr. FIELD. I am only sorry that we allowed so many amendments to be offered to the bill.

Mr. STONE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn until Monday.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion to fix the day to which the House will adjourn takes precedence of the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 63, nays 148, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Lamar, Leach, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Neal, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, William A. Smith, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, and John D. Young—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Killinger, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Speer, Sprague, Charles A. Stevens, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—148.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Berry, Biery, Bland, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Caulfield, Chittenden, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Curtis, Dobbins, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Freeman, Frye, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Havens, Hendee, Holman, Howe, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lofland, Luttrell, Mitchell, Morrison, Niblack, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Potter, Rainey, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, A. Herr Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Southard, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Wells, Ephraim K. Wilson, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—76.

So the motion of Mr. RANDALL was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. BLAND. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. HAVENS; if here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PIKE, and Mr. NIBLACK is paired with my colleague, Mr. SMALL; if present my colleagues would vote in the negative, and Mr. NIBLACK and I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is paired with Mr. LOFLAND; if present Mr. LOFLAND would vote "no," and Mr. YOUNG "ay."

Mr. SPEER. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. They have not, for that motion is not pending.

Mr. SPEER. I understood it was pending. (At seven o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry or suggestion for the purpose of facilitating business. It rests upon the fact that there are, as stated by different gentlemen, enough motions to be made and decided to take from six to ten hours before we arrive at a result on the bill, and that will carry us over until to-morrow morning. My inquiry is whether an agreement to take the vote on the bill immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday will be satisfactory to both sides of the House? I ask the gentleman from Indiana in charge of the bill [Mr. COBURN] to say what he thinks of the proposition? I submitted it to him a few moments ago, and he left me, as I understood, with the view of inquiring of some of his associates about it.

Mr. COBURN. I have not had an opportunity to consult with anybody in reference to the matter.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will do so while the vote is being taken on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken; and there were—yeas 74, nays 153, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Magee, Marshall, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, O'Brien, Perry, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, and John D. Young—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Charles A. Stevens, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—153.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barrere, Berry, Biery, Buffinton, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Curtis, Dobbins, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Freeman, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Holman, Hoskins, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Lofland, Luttrell, McLean, Mitchell, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Henry B. Sayler, Schell, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Stone, Stowell, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Charles W. Willard, Ephraim K. Wilson, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—60.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. PIKE; and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. NIBLACK, is paired with the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. SMALL. On this question Mr. NIBLACK and I would vote in the affirmative, while Mr. PIKE and Mr. SMALL would vote in the negative.

Mr. CLEMENTS. My colleague, Mr. BARRERE, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STONE. If they were here, Mr. STONE would vote "ay," and Mr. BARRERE would vote "no."

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Kansas, Mr. PHILLIPS, left the Hall in consequence of illness. He desired me to make this announcement.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

ARKANSAS ELECTION CONTEST.

Mr. CROSSLAND, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority of the Committee on Elections upon the contested election of Gause vs. Hodges, from the first congressional district of Arkansas; which were ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and political rights.

SECURITY OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, &c.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to strike out sections 1, 2, and 4.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the sections proposed to be struck out be read.

The sections were read, as follows:

That if two or more persons, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall invade any of the States of this Union for the purpose of forcibly overthrowing the existing government of said State, or any constituted authority of the same, or for the purpose of interfering in any forcible or unlawful manner with the due execution of the laws of said State or of the United States; or if two or more persons, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall conspire with any other person or persons for any of the unlawful purposes hereinbefore recited, with intent to commit the same, each person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor for a term not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 2. That if two or more persons shall conspire together to overthrow by force or to usurp by violence the State government of any of the States of this Union, or any department thereof; or if any two or more persons shall, in fact, by force and violence attempt to subvert or usurp such State government, or any department thereof; or if any two or more persons shall, by like force and violence, actually overthrow the existing government of any State, or any department thereof, each person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a crime and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than one year and not more than twenty years, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 4. That in case the registration officers appointed under the laws of any State or Territory, where, by the laws of said State or Territory, registration is required as a condition of voting at any election for Representatives in Congress, shall willfully or corruptly refuse or neglect to give any person entitled to vote, at any precinct or voting place established under the provisions of the laws of Congress, or of any State or Territory, full and sufficient opportunities to register in the manner prescribed by law, and within the time fixed by law, or shall by any device or subterfuge impose conditions or enforce discriminations upon voters or classes of voters not declared in such registration-laws or shall refuse or neglect, on request made by the voter or his agent to furnish such voter with a certificate of registration or such other form of evidence of the same as may by law be required in such State or Territory, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 126, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Danford, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eames, Finck, Foster, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barrere, Berry, Biery, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler Clinton L. Cobb, Corwin, Cotton, Crutchfield, Curtis, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Freeman, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Holman, Kendall, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lofland, McCrary, Mitchell, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Phillips, Pike, Ransier, Schell, Scofield, Small, George L. Smith, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Stone, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—42.

So the motion was disagreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. MAYNARD said: I think something was said in not very good temper awhile ago about not coming about the Clerk's desk, and I insist on the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. COOK stated that his colleague, Mr. YOUNG, was paired with Mr. LOFLAND; and that while the latter would vote in the negative, his colleague would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. COX stated that Mr. HOLMAN, who was absent on account of sickness, was paired with Mr. BUFFINTON.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD stated that Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, was paired with Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. PIKE, who would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative; and that Mr. NIBLACK was paired with his other colleague, Mr. SMALL, who would vote in the negative, while Mr. NIBLACK would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to strike out the first, second, and fourth sections.

Mr. CESSNA moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WILBER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 136, nays 106, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Smith, Southard, Stanard, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and John D. Young—106.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Barrere, Biery, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cotton, Curtis, Dawes, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Freeman, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Hendee, Holman, Houghton, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Mitchell, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pratt, Randall, Ransier, Schell, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Small, William A. Smith, Speer, Starkweather, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Stone, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, and Pierce M. B. Young—45.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. CLEMENTS stated that his colleague, Mr. BARRERE, was paired with Mr. STONE, who would vote in the negative, while Mr. BARRERE would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. SHEATS. I move to lay that motion to adjourn over on the table.

Mr. O'BRIEN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn over.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL moved the House adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that in order when the yeas and nays have been called on the motion to adjourn over?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. RANDALL. What becomes of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair declines to receive it.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought so. I now withdraw for the present the motion to adjourn.

Mr. TREMAIN. I rise to a question of order. There has already been one motion to adjourn to a day certain and also one motion to adjourn during the consideration of this question. I submit that under the new rule any further dilatory motions of that kind are not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the new rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TYNER.) That perhaps is not necessary, unless the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] calls for it. There has been no motion to adjourn and no motion to adjourn to a day certain since the question came up on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 74, nays 160, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Luttrell, Magee, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Randall, Read, Robbins, James C. Robinson, Ross, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Killinger, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—160.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Albert, Atkins, Barrere, Biery, Blount, Buffinton, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., Clinton L. Cobb, Cox, Curtis, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Freeman, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Harrison, Havens, Hendee, Holman, Houghton, Kendall, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Leach, Marshall, McCrary, Merriam, Mitchell, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, William R. Roberts, Schell, Isaac W. Scudder, Small, Snyder, Speer, Alexander H. Stephens, Charles A. Stephens, St. John, Stone, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Waldron, and Wolfe—53.

So the motion was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. CLEMENTS said: my colleague, Mr. BARRERE, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STONE. If they were here Mr. BARRERE would vote "no" and Mr. STONE would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will make a proposition to gentlemen on the other side, if they will allow me. It is very evident that it is a mere question of time as to when this bill will be passed; and, furthermore, it is merely a question of time when the Arkansas question will be brought up for consideration. I propose to the gentlemen on the other side that they permit this bill to be passed without further filibustering and that the House order the Arkansas question to be considered on Monday morning.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] says that this is only a question of time, and the time remaining of this session is very short. But we do not understand that that is all there is of this question. We look upon it as a question of principle.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 161, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Perry, Randall, Reed, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Schell, Speer, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements; Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—161.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Atkins, Banning, Barrere, Biery, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Chittenden, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Creamer, Davis, Eden, Farwell, Freeman, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, John T. Harris, Hendee, Holman, Hurlbut, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Leach, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Niblack, O'Brien, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Poland, Potter, James C. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Sheldon, Small, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, and Thompson—56.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PIKE. I desire also to state that the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. NIBLACK, is paired with my colleague, Mr. SMALL. If present, Mr. PIKE and Mr. SMALL would vote "no," and Mr. NIBLACK and I would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BECK. Is the previous question now exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the question now is, Will the House order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. RANDALL. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 136, nays 109, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Field, Fort, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Killinger, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—136.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Foster, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hunton, Kasson, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Poland, Potter, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Stone, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young.—109.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barrere, Biery, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Crutchfield, Curtis, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eden, Farwell, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Havens, Hendee, Holman, Kelley, Kendall, Lamison, Lamport, McCrary, Mitchell, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Phillips, Pike, Rusk, Isaac W. Scudder, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Small, J. Ambler Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, and Wheeler—42.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

During the roll-call the following amendments were made:

Mr. CLEMENTS. On this question I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. BARRERE, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STONE. If Mr. BARRERE were here he would vote "ay," and Mr. STONE would vote "no."

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. KELLEY, is paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. SWANN. If Mr. KELLEY were present he would vote "ay," while Mr. SWANN would vote "no."

Mr. ALBRIGHT. My colleague, MR. BIERY, is sick. If here he would vote "ay." I desire to state further that my colleague, Mr. STRAWBRIDGE, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. CROOKE. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. CRITTENDEN, is detained from the House by sickness. If here he would vote "no."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. WHEELER, has retired from the Hall in consequence of the state of his health. If here he would vote "no."

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. SWANN, has retired to his home on account of sickness. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. RUSK. Upon this vote and upon the vote on the final passage of the bill I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MITCHELL. If he were here he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that on these votes I have been paired with Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, with the understanding that gentlemen on the democratic side of the House would vote if necessary to make a quorum on every vote. Let me say further that my colleague, Mr. BUFFINTON, who has retired from the Hall on account of ill health, is paired with Mr. HOLMAN, of Indiana.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to add that Mr. HOLMAN has also retired from the Hall on account of ill health.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COBURN. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WOOD. I ask permission to submit a proposition to the House.

Mr. COBURN. I moved the previous question on the passage of the bill. I want to know if I was recognized by the Chair as making that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to make the motion; but the motion to reconsider takes precedence in this case.

Mr. WOOD. I think that at this hour of the night, after a very hard and laborious session, we should endeavor to bring this day's proceedings to a close.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WOOD. I submit the proposition to both sides of the House whether we cannot proceed to vote at once on the final passage of the bill with the understanding that upon the announcement of the result of that vote the House will adjourn until Monday morning.

Mr. TODD. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask consent of the House for one minute——

Mr. TODD and others objected.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I want it understood that——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute to say that out of the forty democratic Representatives from the States to be affected by the provisions of this bill not one of them has been allowed a word in discussion upon the merits of the bill, but on the contrary the gentleman in charge of it has thought propor to deny time to any of the Representatives from the Southern States who intended to oppose the bill.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the question is upon the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered this bill to be engrossed and read a third time, upon which the yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 100, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—134.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hunton, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Poland, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, William A. Smith, Southard, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Vance, Waddell, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie' Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—100.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albert, Barrere, Beck, Biery, Blount, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Crutchfield, Curtis, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Foster, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Havens, Hendee, Hodges, Holman, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Lowndes, Mitchell, Negley, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Randall, Isaac W. Scudder, Sheldon, Small, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Speer, Alexander H. Stephens, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Wells, Wheeler, George Willard, and James Wilson—53.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. COX said: On this question Mr. HOLMAN, of Indiana, is paired with Mr. BUFFINTON, of Massachusetts. Mr. HOLMAN is against this bill in all its stages.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask leave to make a proposition to the House. Before I do that I ask leave to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who I understand desires to make a brief personal explanation.

Mr. LAMAR. I shall not make it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well. My proposition I have put in the form of an agreement, so that there shall be no mistake. It is agreed that, two test-votes on the engrossment and third reading of the bill having been now had, the minority will permit the final passage of the bill without further opposition, whereupon the majority will at once adjourn without taking up any further business. The minority will ask a further test-vote now upon the final passage of the bill only, and in consideration thereof will not insist upon the reading of to-day's Journal on Monday.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed to consent to that proposition. I am the more glad at the latter part of it because it gives us the opportunity by waiving the right to have the Journal read on Monday morning to show that we have stood here as a minority sincerely wishing the passage of the appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not want any understanding that one bill rather than another shall be taken up on Monday.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask no such understanding.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is understood also that the reconsideration of the vote on the final passage shall be laid on the table without opposition.

Mr. RANDALL. We desire only that the vote on the final passage of the bill to-night shall be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And the motion to reconsider laid on the table?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. NEGLEY. With the distinct understanding that there shall be no interference with other bills on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition. This bill having now been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, the arrangement proposed is that without further delay the vote be taken on the final passage by yeas and nays; no vote on reconsideration to be taken except viva voce; that the House shall then adjourn, and that on Monday morning the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let it be understood that nothing is waived except the reading of the Journal; that in all other respects we are under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. This arrangement does not touch anything else than that. The proposition is not in a form to be journalized; therefore the Chair has stated it. The Chair hears no objection to the arrangement.

The bill was then read a third time by its title.

Mr. TODD. I wish to inquire whether there is any subject that will have preference on Monday morning, or whether that will be in the power of the House?

The SPEAKER. It will be in the power of the majority of the House. The rule especially urgent at the end of the session is that the Chair recognizes those having charge of the public business, technically so-called. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will undoubtedly ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill. The majority of the House, if it should negative that proposition, will then determine what business shall be proceeded with.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is no understanding to-night beyond the simple waiving of the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. None whatever. The bill has now been read three times; and the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. CONGER. There is one point that we do not understand. Will the Speaker please explain whether the motion to reconsider is to be laid on the table so as to finish the bill to night.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding.

A MEMBER. And the vote on that question is to be taken viva voce.

Mr. BERRY. I would like to inquire whether it is in order to move to amend the title of the bill so as to read "An act providing for the election of the President for a third term."

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the final passage of the bill, and it will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 114, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crooke, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, James W. Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—135.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Foster, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Eugene Hale, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hunton, Kasson, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, O'Brien, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Poland, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—114.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Barrere, Biery, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Eden, Farwell, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hendee, Holman, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Mitchell, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Phillips, Pike, Richmond, Rusk, Isaac W. Scudder, Sheldon, Small, Alexander H. Stephens, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, and Wheeler—38.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. O'NEIL. On this question my colleague, Mr. KELLEY, is paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. SWANN. My colleague, if present, would vote "ay" and Mr. SWANN "no."

Mr. RUSK. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MITCHELL, who if present would vote in the negative, while I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. RICHMOND, who is paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. HAMILTON, would if present vote "ay," while Mr. HAMILTON would vote "no."

Mr. CROOKE. My colleague, Mr. CHITTENDEN, is detained from the House by sickness. If here he would vote "no."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. BUFFINTON, is paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, both gentlemen being sick. I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. STEPHENS.

A MEMBER. How would you vote?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Of course I should vote "ay," and Mr. STEPHENS "no." Of course Mr. BUFFINTON would vote "ay," and Mr. HOLMAN "no."

Mr. ALBRIGHT. My colleagues, Mr. BIERY and Mr. STRAWBRIDGE, are sick and unable to be here. If present they would both vote "ay."

Mr. CLEMENTS. I repeat the announcement that my colleague, Mr. BARRERE, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STONE. My colleague would vote for the passage of this bill, and Mr. STONE would vote against it.

Subsequently,

Mr. CLEMENTS said: I learn that upon this question the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STONE, is recorded as voting. If he has come in and voted it has been without my knowledge, as I announced the "pair" at his request. I now withdraw the announcement.

Mr. RANDALL. Have both gentlemen voted?

Mr. CLEMENTS. No, sir.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. BARRERE is very ill and not able to be here.

Mr. SPEER. I have been absent from the House to-night upon the committee of conference on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and hence I have perhaps missed some roll-calls. I now vote "no" on the passage of this infamous bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. I object to the gentleman's vote.

Mr. PELHAM. So do I.

Mr. SPEER. On what ground?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has a right to object to a vote given in that way.

Mr. PELHAM. I object to the remarks made by the gentleman in giving his vote.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman may have the right to object to my remarks, but he has no right to object to my vote.

Mr. PELHAM. The remarks are what I object to.

The SPEAKER. A vote, like a motion to adjourn, cannot be accompanied with anything in the nature of debate. It must be given simply "yea" or "nay."

Mr. SPEER. I was in the Hall during this roll-call and have the right to vote. No gentleman has any right to object to my vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again call the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

The name of Mr. SPEER being again called, he voted "no."

Mr. PELHAM. I desire to say that if there were any more republicans here from Alabama they would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. The remark of the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LAMISON, is paired with my colleague, Mr. STRAWBRIDGE. On the passage of this bill the former, if present, would vote "no," the latter "ay." I am also requested to announce (possibly the announcement has already been made) that my colleague, Mr. RICHMOND, who if present would vote in favor of the passage of the bill, is paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. HAMILTON, who would vote against the bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER, (at twelve o'clock and five minutes a. m. Sunday, February 28.) In accordance with the order already made, the House stands adjourned until Monday morning next at eleven o'clock.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of William H. Bailey, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Communication of John F. Young, of Philadelphia, in relation to taking a census in 1876, to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the Proposed National Census of 1875.

By Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: Resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, requesting Congress to make an appropriation to the Dismal Swamp Canal, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, requesting an appropriation to deepen the waters in the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 1, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4848) for the payment of Edward Hubbard for mail service was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 4787) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the credentials of Hon. Isaac P. Christiancy, chosen by the Legislature of Michigan as Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read and ordered to be filed.

OFFICERS REAPPOINTED IN THE ARMY.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their amendments, and agree to the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment:

Add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That hereafter whenever any person who was mustered out as a supernumerary officer of the Army with one year's pay and allowances, in addition to the pay and allowances due him at the date of his discharge, under the provisions of the "act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870, shall be reappointed by the President an officer of the Army, such appointment shall be under and with the express condition that 50 per cent. of such officer's pay shall be stopped monthly until the sum total of the extra year's pay and allowances received by him when mustered out as aforesaid shall have been refunded to the United States.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the title of the bill, and agree that the title shall be amended so as to read as follows:

An act approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870, and to provide for repayments of certain moneys paid to officers mustered out of the Army as supernumerary but subsequently reappointed by the President.

And the Senate agee to the same.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
M. W. RANSOM,
B. WADLEIGH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LEWIS B. GUNCKEL,
EPPA HUNTON,
J. M. THORNBURGH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, praying for a division of that Territory and the organization of a new Territory out of the nothern portion thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, praying for an additional appropriation for the military wagon-road from the Big Sioux River to Fort Randall; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a large number of petitions numerously signed by citizens of California, stating that crime, violence, immorality, poverty, and domestic misery are all attributable to the use of intoxicating spirits, and that the amount of loss occasioned by them is greater than the amount of revenue derived from them, and they ask for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of all intoxicating liquors, to take effect on the 1st of January, 1876, or as soon thereafter as possible. I will remark that I find that these petitions are largely signed by women. The only manner by which they can be heard in the national councils is by petition, and I trust the day will soon come when their influence may be felt more directly; but, awaiting that time, I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of citizens of Dakota Territory, praying that the "Black Hills" be opened for settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial of the Wilmington Board of Trade and ship merchants and others, remonstrating against abolishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that $200 in legal-tender notes be granted to each Union soldier who served in the late war instead of the proposed one hundred and sixty acres of land; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PEASE presented a memorial of a committee of the Board of Trade of Columbus, Mississippi, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the Tombigbee River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a memorial of the committee on legislation of the Western Academy of Homeopathy, on behalf of two thousand physicians, remonstrating against the passage of "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1340) for the relief of Charles A. Luke, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2688) for the relief of Albert F. Yerby, administrator of Addison O. Yerby, deceased, or whom it may concern, to report it back with the recommendation that it ought not to pass. This bill comes accompanied by a written report from the House, and as I do not make a written report, I beg leave to state that it is reported adversely for the following reasons:

First. Defective proof to make out the taking of the property.

Second. The property mostly was of a character that would make it within the jurisdiction of the commissioners of claims, and the committee decline to report bills for individuals while the general bill is pending removing the statute of limitation.

Third. If it was not within their jurisdiction we would not make a special case to put it within their jurisdiction.

I therefore move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3774) for the relief of the widow and children of General William Gates, United States Army, to report it with the recommendation that it ought not to pass. As I have frequently been called upon by members of the Senate with regard to this bill, I call their attention to it, so that if any one wishes it to go on the Calendar it may take that course; if not, that it may be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to Penelope T. Heald, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. KELLY. The bill S. No. 1058 was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee had it under consideration and instructed the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] to report it back. He is unwell and has requested, me to do so. I report it back with amendments.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4743) to amend section 649 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1256) to amend the act entitled "An act relating to the Alexandria Canal," approved July 27, 1868, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1342) declaratory of the rights of such Mexican citizens as were established in Territories acquired from Mexico by the treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden treaty, and who have since continued to reside within the limits of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4471) to afford relief in the judicial courts to Robert Erwin, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1515) for the relief of Gustavus F. Jocknick, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4747) supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1321) regulating the salaries of judges of the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of De Soto County, Mississippi, praying the return of taxes assessed and collected on cotton for the years 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Randolph, administrator of the estate of Sarah A. R. Lord, widow of William A. Lord, praying for the passage of a joint resolution removing the bar of limitation in a certain case for damages arising from illegal seizure and sale of cotton, and referring said cause to the Court of Claims, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of S. E. Allen and 44 others, asking that they may be restored to the privileges of the Court of Claims, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 431) for the relief of Horatio Jenkins, jr., J. L. Requa, S. B. Hubbard, and others, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. CONOVER. I ask that the bill go upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 26, 1873, information relative to the pneumatic tube between the Capitol and the Government Printing Office, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

PRINTING OF NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred additional copies of the Navy Register, have instructed me to report the same back with a recommendation that it pass. It will cost but seventy-five dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. What resolution is that?

Mr. ANTHONY. A resolution to print five hundred copies of the Navy Register.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of the Navy Register for 1875 be printed for the use of the Senate.

PRINTING OF ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred the resolution to print five hundred additional copies of the Army Register, have instructed me to report the same back without amendment and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of the Army Register for 1875 be printed for the use of the Senate.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to print and bind in quarto form one thousand copies of each of volumes 2, 7, and 9 of the final reports of the geological survey of the Territories, for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution, to report the same back without amendment and recommend its passage. These copies are to be distributed by the Smithsonian Institute as the other volumes have been, in return for books sent to us from abroad to go into the Congressional Library. I ask the present consideration of the resolution.

The following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives was considered by unanimous consent, and concurred in:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound in quarto form one thousand copies of each of volumes 2, 7, and 9 of the final reports of the geological survey of the Territories, for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

CHOLERA EPIDEMIC IN 1873.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to print ten thousand extra copies of the report of the Surgeon-General of the Army and the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service upon the cholera epidemic of 1873, have instructed me to report the same back with an amendment cutting down the number about one-half. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that it be read as it stands amended by the committee.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed fifty-five hundred extra copies of the report of the Surgeon-General of the Army and the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service upon the cholera epidemic of 1873; twenty-five hundred copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, fifteen hundred copies for the use of the Surgeon-General of the Army, and five hundred copies for the use of the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is one of those resolutions for the distribution of documents. I simply wish to call the attention of Senators to it. We have voted it down heretofore. I ask a vote of the Senate on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Suppose the Senator moves to strike out what relates to distribution by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and move to strike out that part which provides for the distribution of these documents by Congress. We have no facilities for distributing them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the clause providing for distribution by the two Houses of Congress be stricken out, as the number of copies has been reduced already one-half, I think it would be better to print the whole number that was intended for distribution by the Surgeon-General of the Army and the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only effect of that is to allow the Surgeon-General to frank. I supposed we had adopted the principle that we would not distribute public documents at the public expense, having abolished the franking privilege. If we ought not to distribute them under our frank and at the public expense, certainly no Department of the Government ought to do so. A clerk in the Surgeon-General's office ought not to have the franking privilege when we do not have it. I am opposed to all these resolutions for printing public documents at the public expense. Under the law anybody can get documents by paying the mere cost of printing. That is the way the law stands now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not precisely so. Anybody can get the documents by ordering them before they are printed. We have been trying to get a law through to authorize a certain number to be printed for sale, but we have not succeeded in doing that. Although I am not particular about this resolution, it seems to me when a commission has been appointed and a large investigation made into matters of very great importance affecting the public, and we have the results placed before us in large manuscript, they should be made public in some way.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a provision of law for making them public. If they are worth reading, I believe the people will buy them. I think we ought not to distribute them free at the public expense.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better take a vote on the whole subject. I move to strike out all that provides for distribution by members of Congress.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON. I agree perfectly with the Senator from Ohio. I do not approve of giving the authority to frank to clerks in any Department or authorizing the Surgeon-General to do it. We should not be giving persons with no responsibility authority to exercise that power which we have taken from ourselves. I think if the public want these documents they ought to be willing to pay the postage on them. I am willing to let my documents go to anybody who will pay the postage on them. Our rooms are full of them now. I have either got to pay the postage on them myself or to keep them and cumber up my rooms. I think it is about time we should get clear of printing a great many of these documents. They bring no credit to anybody, cost a great deal of money to the Government, and benefit only a few indivuals. If it be not disposed of in any other way, I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Allow me first to state in justice to the Surgeon-General, who has had the distribution of some documents which have been very expensive and which have been very creditable to American science and American humanity, that he has distributed them very judiciously, indeed, where they would bring the most credit to us and bring back the most return to us.

Mr. CAMERON. I am not so clear as to that. I have no doubt the Surgeon-General thought he was doing so, but I know it is very difficult for anybody to get these documents. I have had application by the hundreds from physicians and surgeons of reputation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CAMERON. I object.

Mr. MORTON. I ask unanimous consent to take up and pass a very little bill, to which I think there will be no objection whatever.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to the consideration of any business except the regular order.

Mr. MCCREERY. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw the objection he made to the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing. I think that is a very important work, and that it is essential that it should go to the medical profession of the country.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not like to accumulate these documents, but I have such entire confidence in the better judgment and wisdom of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] that I cannot refuse him, and I withdraw my objection at his request.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object. The time belongs to the Committee on Commerce. I object to the consideration of anything else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports from committees are still in order.

WRITS OF ERROR.

Mr. CARPENTER. A bill passed the Senate at the last session, and I believe unanimously, in regard to writs of error, that has been amended by the House of Representatives in one particular, adding a section which in the opinion of the Judiciary Committee is proper and ought to be adopted. I ask the Senate to concur in that amendment of the House of Representatives at this time. I am authorized to report back with a favorable recommendation the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 935.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 6. That the writ of error sued out and allowed as hereinbefore provided shall be entered upon the docket of the Supreme Court forthwith, and the argument of such cases of habeas corpus shall have precedence of all other causes in said court.

The amendment was concurred in.

The House of Representatives also proposed to amend the title of the bill so as to make it read—

A bill to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes, for hearings therein, and in cases of habeas corpus.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1284) regulating writs of error in certain criminal cases, have instructed me to report the same back, and to ask its indefinite postponement. It relates to the same subject which the Senate has just passed on.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CARPENTER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4744,) to punish certain larcenies and the receivers of stolen goods, have instructed me to report the same back. It is a brief act, passed by the House, and the committee recommend its adoption with two amendments striking out and inserting two or three words; and as this bill is indispensable to permit the Treasury to accumulate funds to take care of the appropriations which are to be made by the Committee on Commerce, I hope the Senator from Michigan will let this bill pass. It can lead to no debate, and can be passed in half the time I take in asking the Senate to waive objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall object to the consideration of that or any other bill.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I will take the bill back and wait until the Senator gets through.

EULOGIES ON SENATOR BUCKINGHAM.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That ten thousand copies of the addresses delivered in the two Houses on the occasion of the announcement of the death of Hon. William A. Buckingham, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut, be printed and bound; five thousand each for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives.

CONSULATES IN RUSSIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. The time has come for the Committee on Commerce. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1339.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1339) to abolish the consulate at Amoor River and establish a consulate at Vladivostock, Russia, and for other purposes, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill discontinues Amoor River, in Russia, as a consulate of class 5, in Schedule B, as the same was amended by chapter 275 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress; and makes Vladivostock a consulate of class 5, in Schedule B, and exempts the consul at Vladivostock and the consuls at Fayal and Auckland from the prohibition to engage in business and trade embraced in sections 1699 and 1700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the bill (S. No. 1224) to abolish the consulate at Amoor River and establish a consulate at Vladivostock, Russia, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

WAGON-BRIDGE AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move now to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1230.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1230) to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. I wanted to move an amendment to the bill. Let the bill lay aside for a moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let it be laid aside informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. ALLISON subsequently said: I understand the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to withdraw his objection to taking up the bill relative to a bridge at Dubuque.

Mr. HOWE. I gave an amendment to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that I wanted put on that bill. I cannot redrauhgt the amendment now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan desire to take up the bill that was laid aside?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1230) to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask to have the last section read as to repeal, &c.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the bridge shall be constructed with a suitable ponton-draw of not less than five hundred feet in width, located over the main channel of the river: Provided, That said bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plan and specifications for its construction have been submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, nor until he shall approve the plan and the location of said bridge; and if any change be made in the plan of construction of said bridge at any time, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and any change in the construction, or any alteration of said bridge that may be directed at any time by Congress or the Secretary of War, shall be made at the cost and expense of the owners thereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there not a section which authorizes Congress hereafter to alter, amend, or repeal the law? I move to amend by adding:

SEC. 3. That this act shall be subject to amendment or repeal at the pleasure of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE AT THE GRAND CHAIN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1152.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1152) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near the Grand Chain, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Commerce reported an amendment to the bill in line 4 of section 2 after the word "span" to insert "or spans;" so as to read:

The draw span or spans shall not be less than two hundred feet in length in the clear.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BOGY. Is the bill on its passage?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not yet. It is open to amendment.

Mr. BOGY. I have no amendment, but I object to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOGY. I will state that this is a bill for a bridge above Saint Louis and I have no information on the subject. It provides for a two hundred and fifty feet span and for a draw-bridge. Anybody at all acquainted with the Mississippi River knows that it is a very dangerous thing there to build a bridge with such a span.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow the bill to be laid aside? I prefer that rather than debate.

Mr. BOGY. Yes sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope we shall go on with the bill.

Mr. BOGY. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT EAST PASCAGOULA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4141.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 4141) to make East Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi, a port of delivery in the district of Pearl River was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 320) fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

A bill (H. R. No. 4850) authorizing the appointment of gaugers for the customs service at the port of Philadelphia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3808) for the relief of Charles Valier.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 792) for the relief of John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Powell; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4727) explanatory of the act passed June 20, 1874.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the time of the Committee on Commerce be extended one hour.

Mr. BAYARD. One hour beyond the morning hour?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the motion. The morning hour has now expired.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope that will not be done. I desire to take up the tariff and tax bill as soon as it is in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair must lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask for thirty minutes more for the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend the time for half an hour for the Committee on Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not object to the extension of the time, but I merely want to make a report from a committee and ask that it be acted on at once. It is only to make the law of this District conform to the laws of Virginia and Maryland in regard to game. I shall make no remarks upon it but merely report it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I must object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will move that his committee have half an hour when the tax bill is disposed of, I will not object.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I object to that.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government is the unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that that be laid aside informally and that the time for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Commerce be extended for one hour. I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves that the bill be postponed, and that one hour be given to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That requires unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By the rules it does.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move that all prior orders be postponed for considering bills from the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves that the present bill and all prior orders be laid aside for the purpose of taking up bills from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If no one else objects, I will not object to the Senator having half an hour more this morning.

Mr. CHANDLLR. Very well; I will take the half hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask the Chair——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Do I understand that this agreement by unanimous consent is confined to the business of the Committee on Commerce, to the exclusion of everything else?

Several SENATORS. Yes; yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Commerce had a portion of the morning hour. The Senator from Michigan wishes to extend it for half an hour longer. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not object to that if it is to the exclusion of everything else.

INVASION OF STATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the Chair, before the business goes on, will lay before the Senate a bill from the House which is on the desk of the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill——

Mr. BAYARD. Does it not require unanimous consent after the morning hour has passed to lay before the Senate a bill from the House? Can this bill be laid before the Senate without unanimous consent, the morning hour having expired? As I understand the rules of the Senate, it cannot be, and I object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is any trouble about this point of order, I wish to say a word. Messages from the House of Representatives, as the rules of the Senate are, can be received at any time. Then they are laid on the Vice-President's table, and, according to the universal practice of the Senate, he lays them before the Senate at any time when it is the convenience of the Vice-President. Nothing is lost by it to any Senators who are opposed to this bill. The bill can only be read once to-day unless Senators are willing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the practice of the Senate has been, whenever bills came in, to lay them before the Senate at the earliest convenient moment, either in the morning hour or at any other time, and no objection has ever arisen. The Chair is of the opinion that the practice should settle the case in the absence of any rule to the contrary. The Chair is of the opinion that it is in order now to lay the bill before the Senate. The Chair may be in error, and will be governed by the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the bill read the first time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill——

Mr. THURMAN. I object to the second reading of that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has not yet been read.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I object to the first reading of that bill. I hold that the regular business of the morning hour having expired, the regular order now is the tax bill. That is before the Senate, as a matter of course. That being the regular business before the Senate, nothing can dispense with it except a disposition of that business by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair has already overruled that point of order. If there is no appeal taken, let us have the bill read the first time.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I did not so understand. Did the Chair so rule? I call for the reading of the twenty-fourth rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the uniform practice of the Chair to lay House bills before the Senate, when they are on the table, at all hours of the day, and no objection has ever before arisen in regard to it. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order to lay this bill before the Senate and have it read once.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That is the decision of the Chair?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I call for the reading of the twenty-fourth rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be read.

The SECRETARY. To prevent subversion——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Before the reading of the title, I call for the reading of the twenty-fourth rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the title of the bill will be arrested. The Senator from Maryland asks for the reading of the twenty-fourth rule. The twenty-fourth rule will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I were inclined to be very nice, I could object to the reading of the twenty-fourth rule.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I call for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He is not entitled to call for it. He can have it read, however; I do not make any objection.

The Secretary read the twenty-fourth rule, as follows:

After the Journal is read, the Presiding Officer shall lay before the Senate messages from the President, reports from the Executive Departments, and bills and joint resolutions, or other messages from the House of Representatives. He shall then call for—

Petitions and memorials;
Reports of committees;
The introduction of bills;
Joint resolutions;
Resolutions;

all which shall be received and disposed of in such order, unless unanimous consent shall be otherwise given; and every petition or memorial, or other paper, shall be referred, of course, without putting a question for that purpose, unless the reference is objected to by a Senator at the time such petition, memorial, or other paper is presented. And before any petition or memorial, addressed to the Senate, shall be received and read at the table, whether the same shall be introduced by the Presiding Officer, or a Senator, a brief statement of the contents of the petition or memorial shall verbally be made by the introducer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes simply to state that the custom has been in the morning hour always to lay these papers before the Senate and the practice has been at any other portion of the business of the day to do so, to lay before the Senate bills coming from the House as they came in. The Chair would have laid this bill before the Senate early this morning, but was requested on account of the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary not to lay it before the Senate at that time. The Chair acted on that suggestion as he would on the suggestion of any Senator as a matter of accommodation, and he did not lay the bill before the Senate until this time. The Chair is of opinion that the practice should govern the case and it is in order to lay this bill before the Senate and have it read once. The Senator from Ohio objects to its being read the second time to-day. That objection is in order.

Mr. BAYARD. May I submit with respect——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any appeal from this decision? We do not want to waste time.

Mr. BAYARD. I appeal, pro forma for the purpose of submitting the point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be entered in the Journal that an appeal is taken.

Mr. BAYARD. The object of the rule, as I understand it, and of all parliamentary rules, is to procure deliberation. This is a deliberative assembly and all our acts are supposed to be the result of deliberation. To secure deliberation the rules of this body have been established, and the twenty-sixth rule requires that—

Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings previous to its being passed, and the Presiding Officer shall give notice at each whether it be the first, second, or third; which reading shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise.

Read that rule in conjunction with Rule 24. Rule 24 provides for the orderly initiation of the business of each day. The Journal shall be read; then—

The Presiding Officer shall lay before the Senate messages from the President, reports from the Executive Departments, and bills and joint resolutions, or other messages from the House of Representatives. He shall then call for—

Petitions and memorials;
Reports of committees;
The introduction of bills;
Joint resolutions;
Resolutions;

all which shall be received and disposed of in such order, unless unanimous consent shall be otherwise given.

I am aware that the punctuation and the typographical arrangement of this order of business varies somewhat from the list commencing with petitions and memorials as to the due order of the presentation by the Presiding Officer of bills and joint resolutions or other messages from the House of Representatives; but this I do submit: that when the rules contemplate three days they mean three full parliamentary days; they did not mean the very end of a day. A parliamentary day consists of the entire time to which the session of the Senate shall be continued, whether it be prorogued by a recess—in effect a parliamentary day may have forty-eight or more hours; and I submit that this being the parliamentary day of Monday and the business of the Senate having proceeded according to the twenty-fourth rule, if the decision shall be accepted by the Senate that up to the very moment of our adjournment to-night before twelve o'clock a bill may be presented from the House and count as one day, then there is an absence of that full opportunity for deliberation which your twenty-sixth rule was intended, in aid of the twenty-fourth, to secure.

Sir, these rules are the especial right of the minority. Each party has its responsibility; each individual has his responsibility. It is the right and the duty of the minority to insist upon these rules that were made for their protection and for the conduct of public business. If a day can by construction be frittered away to a single hour or five minutes, then the object for which three regular readings on different days must be given to a measure unless unanimous consent waives the requirement, will be in effect destroyed. Therefore I submit that there is every reason why, in the absence of unanimous consent, the morning hour having passed, the regular business of the body having been called in accordance with the rule of the Senate, this bill should not be presented now. If at any time during the session of the day a bill can be introduced and read for the first time, then the day that was intended to be secured becomes the mere shadow of a day. It is that minute fragment of a day utterly useless for the purpose of deliberation for which these rules were designed. Believing that, I shall regret to see anything that tends to place obstacles in the way of deliberation. No parliamentary body can afford in that way to break the force of their rules. The precedent is evil. I do submit that, deliberation being the object of this rule the construction of Rule 24 by the light of Rule 26 necessarily excludes the reception of a message from the other House of Congress except by unanimous consent after the order in which it is mentioned in the rule is passed by the efflux of time and by the presence of other and pending measures entitled to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend's reasoning on this subject is so metaphysical that I think we ought to have more time to consider it, and I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the appeal lie on the table.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw my appeal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The appeal is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us have the bill read the first time. It has not been technically read yet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate the bill for a first reading.

Mr. BAYARD. I object to its second reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it has not been read a first time. The reading was arrested in the middle, and we shall be told to-morrow that it has not been read once.

The bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections, was read the first time by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be printed.

The bill was ordered to be printed.

MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 976, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that seventeen or eighteen minutes of my time have expired, and I shall claim a full half-hour from this time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 976) to promote economy and efficiency in the marine-hospital service was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Commerce report the bill with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to insert after line 7, of section 1, the words—

From and after the completion and publication of said schedule.

So as to read:

And from and after the completion and publication of said schedule, hospital dues at the rate and for the periods prescribed in sections 4585 and 4587 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be assessed and collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as section 2:

SEC. 2. That from and after May 1, 1875, every vessel subject to hospital tax, except vessels required by law to carry crew lists, shall have and keep on board, subject to inspection and verification at all times by any officer of the customs, a seaman's time-book, which shall be furnished by the Treasury Department; and in which time-book shall be entered the name, date of shipment, and date of discharge of every seaman employed on board such vessel; and the master or owner of any vessel subject to hospital tax, vessels carrying crew lists as above excepted, shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty dollars for each and every seaman found employed on board his vessel without a corresponding entry in said time-book; and the sums so forfeited shall be collected by the collector of customs upon the sworn statement of the customs officers who make the inspections, and shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of the marine-hospital fund, for the general purposes of which fund said sums are hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The printed seventh section, which is the next amendment, was never agreed to by the committee. It is a mistake of the clerk of the committee that that is here. Therefore I propose that the seventh section be omitted. It was never agreed to in committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) That will be done, if there be no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. And the eighth section should be amended so as to conform to what was agreed to in the Committee on Commerce. It should read:

That the compensation of the supervising surgeon shall be paid out of the marine-hospital fund, at the rate of $3,500 per annum.

Before the question is put on that amendment I will ask the Secretary to read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 27, 1875.

SIR: Your attention is respectfully invited to the necessity for such legislation as will secure adequate compensation to the supervising surgeon, whose salary is now fixed by paragraph 4802 of the Revised Statutes at $2,000 per year.

For this purpose it is recommended that the following clause be inserted as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill:

That hereafter the salary of the supervising surgeon of the United States marine-hospital service shall be paid out of the marine-hospital fund at the rate of $4,000 per year.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. LOT M. MORRILL,
Chairman Senate Appropriation Committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In order to make this amendment as reported by the Committee on Commerce conform to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, I move to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$4,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECURITY OF NAVIGATION ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3379.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3379) for the further security of navigation on the Mississippi River was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to inquire into the expediency of causing sheer-booms to be placed on the upper end of all bridge-piers on the Mississippi River for the better security and convenience of the navigation of the river for rafts of logs and lumber, and if, in his opinion, it will better secure the navigation of the river, he is directed to require all bridge companies to place sheer-booms above the piers as the Army engineer having charge of the river may direct, the same to be constructed and maintained at the expense of such companies or bridge-owners.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 5, after the word "all" to insert the words "or any;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the expediency of causing sheer-booms to be placed on the upper end of all or any bridge-piers on the Mississippi River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 8, after the word "lumber" to insert the words "with specific report in each case;" so as to read:

For the better security and convenience of the navigation of said river for rafts of logs and lumber, with specific report in each case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words:

And if, in his opinion, it will better secure the navigation of said river, he is hereby authorized and directed to require all bridge companies to place said sheer-booms above the piers as the Army engineer having charge of said river may direct, the same to be constructed and maintained at the expense of such companies or bridge-owners.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2541.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2541) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff, Arkansas, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. This is a bill to authorize the State of Arkansas to throw a bridge across a river of her own, entirely within her own domain. If a court, or Congress, or any other tribunal whose words we are bound to respect has ever decided that Arkansas cannot build this bridge without an act of Congress, I should like to know what that decision is.

Mr. CLAYTON. Do I understand the Senator from New York to say that the Arkansas River is entirely within the domain of Arkansas?

Mr. CONKLING. Where the bridge is to be built.

Mr. CLAYTON. The river itself does not lie entirely in that domain.

Mr. CONKLING. Some other part of the river, it may be, does not. The Hudson River does not lie entirely in the State of New York; it lies between New Jersey and New York at one point. The Arkansas River is long and lies in different places. I repeat the statement—the Senator will correct me if I am wrong—that the Arkansas River at the point where this bridge is to be built, and for a long space above and below, lies wholly within the State of Arkansas. If that be the fact, I ask the Senator to tell me where it is said by Congress, or the courts, or any other authority whose decision we are bound to respect, that Arkansas has not just as much right to bridge that river now as she will have after this act passes?

Mr. CLAYTON. I can say that in 1871 Congress did pass a bill of the same character to authorize the construction of a bridge at Little Rock, in Arkansas.

Mr. SPENCER. Congress has passed a large number of just such bills.

Mr. CLAYTON. It seems to me Congress, under the power to regulate the commerce on that river, would have power to prevent the construction of bridges if they were undesirable. If the construction of bridges would interfere with commerce on the river, Congress have that control.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to lay the bill on the table in order to stop debate.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe the Senator from Michigan has not the floor to make that motion. I have the floor myself. I will yield it in a moment, but wish to make a remark.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Arkansas tells us that a bridge bill passed, the site of which bridge was at Little Rock, recently. If so, I am quite sure it passed because it escaped observation, for I know there are a number of Senators who believe as I do that Congress has nothing to do properly with such questions, and that the only effect of meddling with them is to complicate the national authorities and bring us into relations in which we do not belong.

The Senator from Alabama says that many such bills have passed. There he will find that he is quite in error. Many such bills have not passed. I know of one bill beside that to which the Senator from Arkansas referred that did go through inadvertently; and I think it may fairly be called such a bill. On the contrary this question has been for years in the courts; it was in the Wheeling bridge case; and the court said that the Ohio River being like the Mississippi a boundary river and draining five States, and it being the subject of an ordinance between the State of Kentucky and other States, and there being other special facts in the case, there were reasons there why jurisdiction should attach. In the State of New Jersey and the State of Pennsylvania this question has repeatedly arisen, in the State of New Jersey upon the Passaic River and in the State of Pennsylvania upon the Schuylkill River, where the commerce and navigation is much greater than it is on the Arkansas River at the point in question. It has arisen in the State of New York in respect of the Hudson River, and these cases have gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, and no judgment has ever yet been obtained from that court holding that it is the duty of Congress to say whether Arkansas shall bridge the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff or not. I do not believe that it is worth while for Congress to be too enterprising or pragmatic in inventing the modes in which it can exert power. I am not prepared to assert that there is under the Constitution no power to say anything on this subject. I am arguing, however, that upon the judicial decisions and the legislation of the country there is no need whatever for meddling with this and no occasion for subjecting Congress to claims by parties who may come back afterward if shall be necessary to abate this bridge or change its piers and claim compensation from the national Treasury.

I have said this much—I am sorry that I have detained the chairman of the Committee on Commerce in saying it—because I would not have the Senator from Arkansas suppose that my objection is a hap-hazard one or aimed at this particular bill; but I intend to object in all cases to Congress undertaking to exercise the police powers over rivers wholly within States, which powers belong to the States themselves and have been sufficiently exercised for a hundred years.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 32, noes 10.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; it further insisted on its amendments to other amendments of the Senate on the said bill, and agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ISAAC C. PARKER of Missouri, Mr. G. L. FORT of Illinois, and Mr. S. J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4441) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1876.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4320) to amend the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, 1868; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 330) fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870, and to provide for repayment of certain moneys paid to officers mustered out of the Army as supernumerary but subsequently reappointed by the President;

A bill (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes, for hearings therein, and in cases of habeas corpus;

A bill (S. No. 958) for the relief of J. E. D. Couzins, of Saint Louis; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) to provide for the preservation of the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read by their titles twice and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 4850) authorizing the appointment of gaugers for the customs service at the port of Philadelphia—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 3808) for the relief of Charles Valier—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 4320) to amend the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, 1868—to the Committee on Railroads.

BRIDGE AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to revise, amend, and consolidate the laws relating to the security of life on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes. This bill has been read, rereferred to the committee, and divers and sundry amendments made. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendments and pass the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the consent of the Senator from Michigan and the unanimous consent of the Senate to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 1230 passed a while ago, and that the amendment which I submitted to the Committee on Commerce may be made to that bill, and it then be passed again.

The motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 1230) to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. That bill relates to a bridge at the place where my colleague resides. He is not in at present. I do not know that he will have any objection to this, but I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he has consulted him in reference to it?

Mr. HOWE. I have not, because I cannot find him. When the Senator was here the amendment was not here. He cannot have the slightest objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is moved to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Now I move the amendment which I send to the Chair.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

That the Green Bay and Minnesota Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Wisconsin, may construct, maintain, and operate a pile and ponton bridge of the character described in the act of Congress approved June 6, 1874, to amend section 1 of this act, across the Mississippi River at or near Winona, from the most feasible point in Buffalo County, Wisconsin, to the most feasible point in Winona County, Minnesota, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of said act and of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by adding:

And subject to the right of Congress at any time to amend or repeal the authority hereby granted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM subsequently said: I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 1230) was passed this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) That motion will be entered.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. WINDOM, Mr. CARPENTER, and Mr. STEWART submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STOCKTON, Mr. ALCORN, and Mr. PEASE submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMBOAT LAW.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I move to proceed to the consideration of the House bill No. 1588.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time allotted to the Committee on Commerce has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER. This bill has been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not since it was recommitted. It will have to be read again with the amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. The amendments might be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must call up the regular order, which is the unfinished business of Saturday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I give notice that I shall try to-night to call up the steamboat bill and pass it, if possible.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to get unanimous consent, if I can, for a time to consider this steamboat bill. It is so important that, after it has been here for two sessions of Congress, I think I am justified in asking that unanimous consent be given that an hour be devoted to it this evening at all events.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall object to anything until after the disposal of the tariff and tax bill. When that is disposed of, I I shall not object to anything else.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the Senator object to my making application for unanimous consent?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Not at all.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I ask that one hour after the disposal of the revenue bill may be devoted to the consideration of the steamboat bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel obliged to object, not out of any opposition to the steamboat bill—it may be all right—but with so many other things on the Calendar to interest everybody, I think it ought to take its chance.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Some week or ten days ago, when the Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill (S. No. 661) to give jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear the claim of G. W. Custis Lee to Arlington adversely, I made a motion that it be placed on the Calendar, and stated at the same time that I desired to address the Senate on the subject.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Have I not a right to the floor?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I insist on the regular order. If the man having charge of the bill will not do it I will.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I only rise to make a request which I am sure has never been refused before; that is for a half-hour to address the Senate on the bill referred to by me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the pending bill lie over informally for the purpose of allowing him to address the Senate on another bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I would be the last to refuse a courtesy to the Senator; but this is a public measure. I understand he desires to make a speech upon a question that he does not expect any action upon. I certainly cannot consent to postponing this bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am sure the Senate will not refuse this request to any Senator. It is in my power, if I choose to do so, to move the indefinite postponement of this bill and make my remarks on that motion. I should dislike very much to be placed in that position.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Vermont to give way that I may pass a bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I must refuse all requests until we dispose of this measure.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 3818, an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, report that the said committee have been unable to agree.

AARON A. SARGENT,
GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
JOHN W. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES A. GARFIELD,
ISAAC C. PARKER,
R. MILTON SPEER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate still further insist and that a new committee of conference be appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT being authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, Messrs. SARGENT, LOGAN, and COOPER were appointed.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a preamble and joint resolution of the Legislature of New York, in favor of the passage of an amendment to the homestead law extending the time for actual occupation, &c. Although the rule is to ask that these resolutions be read at length, I will not make that request but move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition signed by a large number of residents of the county of Suffolk, New York, asking that an appropriation to complete the improvement at Fort Jefferson in that county and setting forth the urgent reasons for the same; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THURMAN presented five memorials from late soldiers of the United States Army, praying for the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the Dismal Swamp Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Virginia, remonstrating against the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee and removal of internal taxes and asking the repeal of the act of 1872 reducing the duties on certain imports 10 per cent.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

TAX AND TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I regret that circumstances have thrown this bill into my charge. I was not aware that I should have charge of the bill until the day it was reported. Of course I am in no condition to make what would be considered an elaborate speech upon the bill, nor should I at this late period of the session presume to occupy the time for any such purpose. All that I shall aim to do will be to explain the reasons for the present bill—the necessity of the case—in the briefest possible time. It is a question of whether we will furnish the necessary funds to carry on the Government. There is no question of protection in the bill; it is merely the naked question of revenue.

But it may be asked, why is it that the exigencies of the Government are so great at this present time? I answer that three years ago our revenues from customs were $216,000,000; that they were two years ago $188,000,000, and last year they were but $163,000,000—$25,000,000 reduction in a single year. It is apparent, therefore, that we have reduced the revenues of the country below the point at which they ought to stand for the ordinary support of the various departments of the Government. And since the panic of 1873 and the disasters that have befallen the business of the country, it is very likely that our revenues will diminish considerably more the present year. The business of the world at the present moment is depressed everywhere, and our own country is not an exception. Notwithstanding we reduced the duties upon $150,000,000 or $160,000,000 of articles imported in 1873 by 10 per cent., we imported of these articles alone $55,000,000 less last year than we did the year before.

Now, Mr. President, what are the necessities of the Government? Much more than half are fixed annual appropriations that cannot be reduced at all. Take the amount that is to be paid upon the national debt, considerably over $100,000,000, or about $107,000,000, and that cannot be reduced an iota. Then for pensions about $30,000,000, which must be paid, leaving, therefore, with other sums equally fixed, less than half of all the expenditures from which any deductions can possibly be made.

Now in relation to these appropriations how have we gone on for the past year? Last year the appropriations were reduced for the support of the Government outside of these nearly $20,000,000—upward of $19,000,000—and it is expected that they will be reduced this year by some $7,000,000, although that may not be absolutely certain.

But, Mr. President, our country is largely increasing in population. The expenditures will as a matter of course increase somewhat in proportion to the numbers of population. Take the Army. We have reduced that down to twenty-five thousand men, and it costs now, as it has always cost, at least a thousand dollars per man to support the Army. It costs $27,000,000, a little in excess of a thousand dollars a man to support the Army, and let me say that that Army is no greater in proportion to the numbers of population than our Army was thirty or forty years ago. It is the lowest possible number that is consistent with the security and dignity of the Government even in a time of peace.

Then take the Navy. We appropriated last year $28,000,000 for the Navy, and then we appropriated $4,000,000 when there was a little breeze of war, as a deficiency, upon the first assembling of Congress last December. Now it is proposed to cut that down, and it has been cut down in the bill already passed for 1876 to a little over $16,000,000, or no more than was thought to be necessary perhaps twenty or thirty years ago for barely maintaining the existence of the meager number of meager war-vessels we now have. Where are you to strike in and say, if you choose to say, that the proper way is to cut down the ordinary expenses of the Government to such an extent as will cover a deficit of $35,000,000?

Mr. President, I am as ready as any Senator on this floor to reduce the expenditures of the Government wherever it can be done without detriment to the country. If we do not provide means for the support of the Government, of course the appropriations that have been made will not be and cannot be expended; and the first place where undoubtedly the Secretary of the Treasury would strike to suspend all appropriations would be those under his own control, or the river and harbor bill; the next would be all appropriations that are made for public buildings. I suppose that we have, say, twenty-four buildings that are now in process of completion in all parts of the country and in almost every State. Some of these have only their foundations and first stories up. Others are completed almost, or completed with the exception of being roofed. Others perhaps require but a small amount for their completion and for being made ready at once for occupation and useful for the purposes for which they have been established. To be sure our expenditures for public buildings in six or eight of the large cities have been very large, but perhaps the buildings are no greater than will be ultimately required. Several of these buildings are nearly finished. They require, however, some additional appropriations for their entire completion the present year. We have the Navy Department here in this city—the wing that is intended for their occupation—now in progress. The State Department is completed. We know that the building where the Navy Department is now accommodated is wholly inadequate and unsafe for the purpose intended, and unless an appropriation is made this year, of course the building, although considerably advanced, cannot be completed.

Take the case of Chicago. There is a post-office, custom-house, and court-house building that has been begun, and it will require some further appropriation in order to forward its completion within a reasonable time. The same is true of Cincinnati, of Philadelphia, of New York, of Saint Louis; and then there are a great number where smaller amounts are required. They have been begun, and great los would result even in their temporary abandonment.

But, Mr. President, it is to be seen at once that far more important questions are involved than merely a suspension of the functions of government in any one particular direction, or as to any of the ordinary disbursements of the Treasury. The question of the sinking fund is wholly involved in and dependent upon this bill. Last year it was expected that there would be this year at least $20,000,000 to be devoted to the sinking fund. It is not only ascertained that there will be no such money to be appropriated to that purpose, but that we are to fall short for funds for the ordinary support of the Government. And let me say to Senators that we are pledged by a public solemn declaration of the public faith, involving the honor of the nation, that we will every year devote 1 per cent. to a sinking fund, that is to say, that we will appropriate to that fund a sum equal to the one-hundredth part of the amount of the public debt. Unless we do that we sacrifice our honor, our pledged public faith, and we also deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of all power of refunding $1,157,000,000 of public debt that now is paying 6 per cent. at a lower rate of interest. I regard it as extremely important that we should enable the Secretary to fund all of our remaining debt at a lower rate of interest. Unless we furnish the funds to keep our faith we shall be unable to fund the remainder of the public debt, whereby a large number of millions will be annually saved from now until the maturity of the debt at a lower rate of interest than it now bears. That is the consideration which I press upon my own friends on this side of the Chamber as well as upon the other side of the Chamber. I do think that this is a bill that no Senator, no matter what his politics may be, can afford to vote against.

I will now briefly explain the different parts of the bill. The first section provides for the increase of the tax on whisky from 70 cents to 90 cents per gallon. Before commencing an explanation of the bill, however, let me say that if the bill had been submitted to me for my own preparation as to what would be best I would most certainly have prepared a different bill from this. The bill does not suit me personally, and I presume every Senator could say as much. I should be much better satisfied with something else, but I am satisfied (and so was every member of our committee) that we cannot pass a bill here if we alter it even to the extent of a single word. Such is the condition of the business and rules of the House that further consideration there is impracticable. We must take this bill as it stands or nothing. It is literally "neck or nothing." If I had had my own way I would not have put so much on whisky by 5 cents in the gallon, and I would have omitted the 10 per cent. upon goods which was taken off in 1872 and is now proposed to be reimposed. I am satisfied that so far as protection is concerned the manufacturers of the country would be better protected by something stable than by the imposition of a duty which will surely be repealed at the earliest moment. I may say that the State from which I come, the section from which I come—New England—so far as I know, does not ask for or desire this. I may say further that it is possible it may be a benefit will be conceded to some of the Western and Southern States, where manufactures have sprung up within the last ten or twelve years almost like Jonah's gourd in the night, and have so changed the condition of affairs that they require more protection than the former seat of manufactures, New England. It is a fact that is disclosed by our census returns that while in 1860 New England produced two-thirds of the manufactures of the country, now other portions of the country produce two-thirds and New England but one-third. So much for that.

I would instead of that have imposed a small duty upon tea and coffee. But I remember when this subject was the last time before the Senate I voted for such a duty and found myself in a very small minority. The House of Representatives have taken this question under consideration, and in a House of almost three hundred members but thirty-three were found to be in favor of a tax upon tea and coffee. With the imposition of that, I should then have been disposed to remove all the remainder of the stamp taxes, including those on patent medicines, matches, and bank-checks.

But, Mr. President, I come back to the stern necessity that we must accept this bill or nothing, and I shall regard any amendment that may be proposed and adopted as equivalent to the rejection of the bill.

Mr. President, the first section imposes a tax of 90 cents on each gallon of whisky. I know it will be said that this tax cannot be collected; that we have tried it. But such is not the fact. We tried $1.50 and $2 a gallon and signally failed. We are informed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he can collect this tax, and he says that he can collect $1 with the present machinery as well as the 70 cents now collected.

Further, he estimates that there is as little fraud in the collection of this tax at the present moment as there is in the collection of the tax on any other article whatever, no matter whether it be collected under the internal-revenue laws or at the custom-house. Asserting, as he does, that at least 95 per cent. of the whole tax is collected, we have also the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury at the commencement of this session, who says:

> The means now in use for the collection of tax on spirits will, it is believed, secure the collection of the increased amount.

Then the question comes up, whether it will have any disastrous effect on the agricultural interest. It is impossible but what the same amount in the course of a year will be consumed, let the tax be what it may. It is shown that we collected taxes on sixty to seventy million gallons annually—about sixty-six or sixty-eight millions, I believe—and that amount will be annually consumed whether we levy this tax or not. I know that the mere apprehension of a tax being levied upon the stock on hand has produced the last month between three and four millions in excess of the expected amount from this source, and now, whether we levy this tax or not, we cannot expect for some months to come much increase from that source. We shall not have any increase at present whether we levy the increased tax or not; but in the course of a year, if the increased tax is levied, we shall have it.

Then comes the question of an increase of the tax on tobacco from 20 cents to 24 cents per pound. Formerly the tax upon tobacco was divided. A portion of it was taxed at the rate of 32 cents a pound and a portion at 16. Many of those who paid the 32 cents tax claimed that much of the tobacco that was only taxed 16 cents was of a better quality than that which paid 32 cents, that is to say, the very fine-cut tobacco. To harmonize all difficulties a tax was levied at 20 cents per pound, although many thought it ought to be placed half way between 16 cents and 32 cents, that is, at 24 cents. It was placed at 20 cents, and it is now proposed that it shall be fixed at 24 cents. I understand that this tax is very faithfully collected and that there is no difficulty in relation to it.

The next amendment is upon cigars, raising them from $5 a thousand to $6 a thousand. It may be complained that there is no additional duty levied upon cigars imported, but I desire to say that the amount of duties now levied upon cigars imported is subject to be increased by the precise amount of the tax now collected on cigars under the internal-revenue law; and that the amount of duties upon cigars is not only large but will be large even if it loses this difference of $1 per thousand on cigars that it is now proposed to be made here. There is no question but that the fine tobacco raised in Cuba and there manufactured into cigars is very heavily taxed, and will be so taxed whether this bill passes or not. It does not change the duties upon those, and it will not subject any cigars made here at home to any competition in consequence.

There is a proviso annexed to this provision in consequence of some peculiarity of the trade of those who have the handling of tobacco. It allows the seller to charge the purchaser upon any contracts heretofore made with the increase of duty. I see no objection to that.

The next proposition is section 3, which provides for an increase of duties upon molasses, melada, and sugar, by the addition of 25 per cent. on the present amount of duties. That is the same increase upon each and every description of sugar, molasses, and melada of 25 per cent. I suppose that this perhaps is one of the most certain articles from which a duty can be secured of any in our whole list of articles that are subject to duty; nor do I conceive that it is very important upon what articles, when they are of universal consumption, a tax is levied. It is in the very nature of taxes, levy them at any points you may, that they will ultimately be distributed over the cost of living where the consumers pay the tax; and I suppose that in the case of all articles upon which an internal-revenue duty is levied there the consumer pays; but it is not so in relation to articles that pay taxes through the custom-house. Take for instance the article of coffee. When we took off the duty the article immediately rose in Brazil to the same amount that we took off the duty, and our people here were not benefited at all; and yet it was a clear loss to the revenue. It sometimes happens that the consumer pays the duty and sometimes not. Most usually the increased price in consequence of duties upon foreign articles is partly paid by the consumer and partly paid by the foreign producer. If the foreign producer must have a market here he must accept of such prices as he can get here and modify his home prices accordingly. So far as this is concerned I do not know but that it might have been amended so that it would have been a little more satisfactory to me than it is now; but at the same time I am quite satisfied that it will yield the revenue, and that is what is important at the present time.

The next section is section 4, which provides for a restoration of the 10 per cent. of the duties that was taken off last year. I desire to explain to the Senate, so that they will understand this, and not consider it so much of a bug-bear or that it increases the duties by the amount of 10 per cent. It is no such thing. Where an article of cotton or iron or woolen bears 25 per cent. the increased duty will be 2½ per cent.; if it bears 30 it will be an increase of 3 per cent.; if it bears 40 it will be an increase of 4 per cent.; and that is all there is of it. It applies mainly to those articles that have heretofore largely contributed to our revenue, but which have been so stimulated by protection for the last ten years, or during the war, that we have begun largely to produce them here at home.

Section 5 provides that goods in warehouse and actually on shipboard shall not be subject to the increased tax. I desire to say that if I could have had my way I would have made articles that are on shipboard and that were not taken out of the warehouse subject to the duties that we may impose by this act, but there is nevertheless a symmetry in the bill. The bill does not propose to tax anything on tobacco or spirits that is on hand. It only proposes to tax such as shall hereafter be produced; and therefore the same privileges are allowed to the importer, to the merchant, that are allowed to the producer here on articles produced at home.

I should have said that there is a provision in the bill which allows only 1 per cent. to be retained by the Government upon the exportation of refined sugar. Upon all goods that are re-exported that is now the amount that is allowed; but upon articles made of raw materials that are imported and manufactured here there has hitherto been allowed, when exported, 10 per cent. to be retained by the Government. The only question here now that arises in my mind is whether the Government can get along and allow sugars to be refined here and re-exported without having any frauds committed upon it. The officers of the Government think they can. I know that all articles of merchandise which are imported now are subject to pay the Government 1 per cent. upon re-exportation, which is retained in the Treasury of the United States. At all events, I do not regard this as of any great importance one way or the other.

The last section of the bill merely restores bolting-cloths to the free list, where they have stood from time immemorial. By a simple mistake in the Revised Statutes they were, however, omitted. It also provides that the books held by depositors in savings-banks, containing merely the name and amount of deposits written in the book from day to day, shall not be subject to a stamp duty. That is all that is contained in the bill.

Mr. MORTON. I would like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I would like to ask the Senator how far the estimated revenues for the current fiscal year will fall short of the appropriations for the current fiscal year, aside from the sinking fund, if at all?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is perhaps impossible to tell how much short. They will fall entirely short of the sinking fund, and they will considerably fall below the expenditures, as would be apparent from December, January, and February. In December our deficiency was $478,000. In January it was $1,819,000, and there would have been a deficiency since but for the large increase paid on spirits in the Internal Revenue Department. A falling off of the revenue for some months to come may be expected.

Mr. President, I have only a few more words to say——

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question if he is through with his statement of the provisions of the bill. Will it be agreeable for me to ask him a question now?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the Senator to state that the net ordinary expenses of the Government were $20,000,000 less this year than formerly; in other words, that there would be $20,000,000 saved. I have looked——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I did not state that. I stated that the appropriations were so much less. I know that there was a deficiency bill in 1873 of $11,000,000. In 1874 there was a deficiency bill of $4,000,000; and I may state that it is most likely there always will be a small deficiency bill; but we have reduced that to the very minimum. I believe the Committee on Appropriations think that the deficiency bill for the coming year will be even less than the last.

But, Mr. President, in addition to all I have stated about the expenditures, there is another question that is open to some doubt. We received last year fifteen millions and a half under the treaty with Great Britain. In the course of the present year a considerable portion of that will be awarded and be required to be paid out of the Treasury. Whether the Treasury is authorized to sell the large bond that was given to the State Department, or any part of it, for the purpose of paying out this sum I know not; but in some way that will have to be met.

Now, Mr. President, under the present circumstances it is a question on which every Senator should act upon his cool and most deliberate judgment whether we will give this Administration the ordinary means for conducting the Government or whether we will visit it with the calamities that are sure to follow if we do not. We shall create discontent in all portions of the country unless the several Departments are able to carry on their business as they have been accustomed to carry it on. Shall we diminish our foreign diplomatic service? Shall we discharge the few men that are kept in the Army? Shall we let what remnant remains of the Navy still rot at the dock? Shall we dispense with the completion of the public buildings we have started, and which would suffer greater damage and detriment by having the work stopped upon them now than the whole amount proposed to be appropriated? Or shall we pass this bill? I cannot believe that it is the sentiment of any portion of this body to leave the Government, in the language that has been made current elsewhere, on the "ragged edge of despair."

Mr. SHERMAN rose.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask one question of the Senator from Vermont before he sits down. I will not keep the Senator from speaking long.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. I was called out for a moment and therefore lost some of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont. I do not know whether he stated how large the deficiency is which he expects to cover by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I can answer the Senator from Missouri in what I intend to submit.

Mr. SCHURZ. Very well; then I will ask the Senator from Ohio how large the revenue is specifically which is expected to be drawn from each of the different sources provided for in the bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We expect to raise about $30,000,000 by this bill. It has been estimated by the Department if the same amount of business shall be done it will be somewhat more than that.

Mr. SCHURZ. That does not answer my question. I find different articles taxed. On whisky, sugar, and tobacco I find the tariff raised, and so on. I would like to know how much is to be drawn from each?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. About $12,000,000 on whisky, about $4,000,000 on tobacco, and seven millions and a half upon sugar and molasses; and nearly $6,000,000 upon tea and coffee.

Mr. SCOTT. And $2,000,000 upon cigars.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And $2,000,000 upon cigars.

Mr. DAVIS. I was about asking the Senator from Vermont who has charge of this bill a question, and before I got through he broke in on me and answered a part of it. I certainly understood the Senator to say that the net ordinary expenses of the Government for the last year were some $20,000,000 less than the year previous. If I am mistaken in that I should like to be corrected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have already corrected the Senator once. I said the appropriations made at the last fiscal year were about $19,000,000 less. I admitted that there was a deficiency bill of $11,000,000, and that the next year a deficiency of $4,000,000, and I also stated that it was the belief of the Appropriation Committee that the present year the deficiency would be still less.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I understand that the appropriations show $19,000,000 less and a deficiency of $11,000,000. That would leave $8,000,000 less, according to the Senator's calculation. I find by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the net ordinary expenses of the Government for 1873 were $180,000,000, in round numbers, and for 1874 $194,000,000, so that really instead of a decrease there is an increase of $14,000,000 last year in the expenditures of the Government. I make that statement, and I should like to have it corrected if I am wrong. Instead of a decrease in the net expenditures of last year over 1873 there was an actual increase of some $14,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to make my statements in regard to this bill as brief as possible. Therefore I will ask the favor of Senators not to interrupt me by any questions, but if they desire any information from me after I get through with the brief statement I will make, I will give it to them with great pleasure.

This bill comes to us with a very taking title. It is almost impossible for me to vote against a bill which was intended "to protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government." But this bill also comes very much in the nature of a "stand and deliver, or die." We are obliged to take this bill without amendment, without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t. It is sent to us at the last hours of a Congress. There is no argument that has been made by my honorable friend from Vermont for the passage of this bill that has not been operative from the beginning of this session, indeed from the panic of 1873. Every motive, every argument, and every reason that can be adduced for the passage of a bill with this title has been in existence during the whole life of the present Congress; and yet now a bill for this purpose is sent to us within a few days before the expiration of a Congress and with a declaration made to us distinctly that you must take that bill or nothing.

Now, in the first place, I do not like that kind of legislation. When we are compelled to take the responsibility of it I would like at least to be consulted as to the terms and conditions upon which we will grant large increased taxation. Let us look a little further. We are told, and told truly, that we are compelled to take one of three different courses. We are compelled either to repeal the sinking fund, or to stop public buildings or some other appropriations, or to provide for new taxes; and I say that it is true we are compelled now at this moment either to levy new taxes or to stop appropriations already made, or to stop the sinking fund. That is the condition in which we are placed.

Mr. OGLESBY. Stop appropriations already made?

Mr. SHERMAN. We must stop or disregard them, one or the other. The most important thing to be considered is to get, if you can, the exact amount of the deficiency we are called upon to meet. It was very proper therefore for the Senator from Missouri to ask the question, first of all, what is the state of our finances? And it is better stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with a letter from him also that I have with me that I will have read, than it can be stated by any figures that I could possibly give; because these are authentic and responsible. We know when we act on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury we can act upon the report of an officer who is responsible to us.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, states that the amount of his estimates of the deficiency for the current fiscal year, made probably in November last, was $22,092,748, after paying the sinking fund. He estimates that the deficiency for the next fiscal year, after paying the sinking fund, will be $11,920,914. Since this estimate was made, however, he has written a letter to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, stating that this estimate was entirely too low; that the rapid falling off of our receipts had been so great that he would estimate the deficiency at a much larger sum. I ought in justice to him ask that this letter be read, so that we may know the precise condition in which we now stand. I will ask the Secretary to read this letter, being a copy of a letter sent to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to invite the attention of your committee to the condition of the revenues of the Government and to urge that such action may be had to increase the same as will not only enable the Treasury to promptly meet all just and legal demands that may be made upon it by public creditors, but to provide it with means to discharge the liabilities of the Government under statutory provisions for the sinking fund.

On page vi of my report to Congress I stated that unless the revenues should increase beyond the amount anticipated there would be a deficiency in the sinking fund account for the current fiscal year of $22,093,748.43. It must be apparent that it is difficult at all times to estimate in advance the probable receipts into the Treasury. The present depression in trade and commerce has more seriously affected the revenues from duties on imports than was anticipated at the time the estimate above referred to was made. They having already fallen below that estimate, in a period of forty-one days, $3,800,000. Should this reduction continue during the remainder of the year, the deficiency will reach the sum of about $35,000,000, and it is hardly probable that business will revive to such an extent as to materially lessen this sum.

In this connection——

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all that is necessary to read. Now, Mr. President, let me repeat, since the panic the deficiency for the year ending the 30th of June, 1874, was $25,000,000. The deficiency for the last fiscal year was $22,092,749. The estimated deficiency for the next fiscal year is $11,920,914, varied however by the statements made in this letter; so that it is manifest that from the time of the panic the deficiency has been decreasing, and that we might fairly expect, if the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury can be relied upon, that during the next fiscal year, without any increase of expenditures, our revenues will be amply sufficient to pay our current expenses and also to pay the sinking fund. The statements made in the letter of the Secretary somewhat varied his figures, but he does not pretend to estimate what will be the deficiency for the next fiscal year.

Now, that estimate is liable to be increased by any additional appropriation that may be made by Congress and also by any deficiency in the current revenues. But it is also liable to be diminished by a less amount of appropriations for this fiscal year than the last, and I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that the amount of the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year will be something like $8,000,000 less than they were for the fiscal year. I will ask my honorable friend from Maine if I am right about that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is rather difficult to say with much accuracy, but approximately I think that is about right as the bills stand at present. The bills that have already passed the Senate are nearly six million five hundred and eighty odd thousand dollars less; but it should be understood, however, that that embraces items which are not among the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Taking the aggregate?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The aggregate. It should be observed that this includes the extraordinary expenses of the Navy for last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not rise to a question of order, but I rise to make a suggestion. Either Senators on the extreme row of seats must be provided with seats near the center of the room, or they must be perpetually debarred from hearing the speeches made by Senators near the center upon interesting questions. We cannot hear a word of what the Senators say upon a most interesting subject—one in which we are deeply interested—upon which we are about to vote. I would like that difficulty to be removed in some way or other

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has reminded the Senate twice of the disorder, and since the remarks of the Senator from Illinois presumes the Senate will now be quiet.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the time the Secretary of the Treasury sent his annual report to us there was no unfavorable condition of our finances, and the only unfavorable aspect of our finances grows out of the statement made subsequent to the annual report, because he shows by his estimates made in November last that the sinking fund would be provided for and all the estimated expenditures would be provided for and leaving only a deficiency of $11,920,914; and to meet this twelve millions of deficiency the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations tells us we have reduced the appropriations below the amount asked for by the Treasury Department some $8,000,000, which would leave a deficiency in the next fiscal year of between three and four million dollars.

Mr. SCHURZ. That is nothing.

Mr. SHERMAN. We must, however, regard the fact stated to us by the Secretary, that since the making up of these estimates the falling off of our customs duties has been rapid, so rapid as to alarm him, and he therefore sends this supplementary estimate, which undoubtedly creates alarm. It must be remembered that the falling off in the sinking fund or this deficiency in the maintenance of the sinking fund has been known to the House of Representatives, which is the only power of our Government which can levy taxes. It had full knowledge two years ago that there was a deficiency in that sinking fund of $25,000,000, and that last year it was $22,000,000, and yet they refused to send us a tax bill by which we could provide in the proper way to meet this deficiency. That this deficiency is constantly diminishing, according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury made in November, is apparent and perfectly clear. I have no doubt that in the ordinary course of events as they existed in November last one year would not roll around before this deficiency would be made good by increased receipts, but the statement made to us by the Secretary of the Treasury during the last month that our customs revenues were falling off rapidly did tend to create alarm, and would induce me now to vote for any tax bill within the bounds of reason, for any tax bill which I thought could be justified on principles of sound political economy.

I said that we have to do one of three things: either to repeal or modify the laws relating to the sinking fund, or to stop a portion of public expenditure, or to levy new taxes.

In regard to the first alternative, I say that by no vote of mine, under any circumstances, will I suspend or stop for a moment the operation of the sinking-fund laws. They are piedges of public faith that must be observed literally and truly, and I am very glad the Secretary of the Treasury has taken the position that whatever else comes that sinking fund shall be maintained. Indeed, the law in regard to the sinking fund is so clear, so strong, that a Secretary of the Treasury who would violate that law would clearly be subject to and ought to be impeached. That law is an element of the public credit and must not be impaired. Let us look a moment. The sinking-fund acts are pretty familiar to the Senate but they will bear repetition. By the act passed at the beginning of the war, February 25, 1862, the customs duties are expressly pledged, first, to the payment of the interest in coin on the bonds of the United States; second, to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States; and third, the residue thereof only to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

It is perfectly clear therefore that the customs duties which were to be collected in gold were set aside and mortgaged just as sacredly as if I should mortgage the house in which I live, set aside as a fund to be applied to specific purposes, and that it is only the balance of this fund that can be used by the United States for other purposes. That is perfectly clear, and to that the public faith is pledged. That law is still the existing law. It has been said in debate elsewhere, and perhaps here, that former Secretaries of the Treasury did not regard that law. That is an entire mistake. During the whole war more than 1 per cent. of the debt was paid annually. It is true new debt was created, new bonds were issued in vast amounts, but still during Secretary Chase's term more than 1 per cent. of the old debt was constantly paid by the payment of demand notes and of various forms of debts as they came in. The account was not maintained as a sinking fund, and yet the fund was applied according to the language of the law. So in the term of our associate now, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] during the whole of that period more than the amount of the 1 per cent. was paid every year on the public debt, and although it was not maintained in the form of a sinking fund until the commencement I believe of his term, yet more than that amount was paid. So in Mr. McCulloch's time, although no formal sinking fund account was oppened, yet more than 1 per cent. of the principal of the public debt was paid every year, and in the aggregate $150,000,000 more of the principal of the public debt was paid than the whole aggregate of the sinking fund. So that it is a mistake to say this was not regarded as a subsisting and binding law. It was the law, and was faithfully observed until after the panic of 1873.

But this is not all. By a subsequent law, passed for the very purpose of organizing the sinking fund, passed at a time when we were paying more than 1 per cent. of the principal of the public debt, another law was passed which makes the sinking fund still more obligatory. I will read it. By the act approved July 14, 1870, it is provided:

Any bonds hereafter applied to said sinking fund, and all other United States bonds redeemed or paid hereafter by the United States, shall also in like manner be recorded, canceled and destroyed, and the amount of the bonds of each class that have been canceled, and destroyed shall be deducted respectively from the amount of each class of the outstanding debt of the United States In addition to other amounts that may be applied to the redemption or payment of the public debt, an amount equal to the interest on all bonds belonging to the aforesaid sinking fund shall be applied, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct, to the payment of the public debt as provided for in section 5 of the act aforesaid. And the amount so to be applied is hereby appropriated annually for that purpose out of the receipts for duties on imported goods.

There were two important provisions added by this section; first, that the bonds which were bought in for the sinking fund should be canceled and destroyed, so as to prevent the possibility of their getting out again. Formerly they had been bought and held as a sinking fund. But the last provision was the material one. It was an express appropriation of money out of this special fund for this special purpose, and no officer of the Government has any right whatever either to violate the law or to take this money appropriated especially out of a special fund to pay ordinary and current expenses. That is perfectly clear. First by the act of February 25, 1862, the fund is made, the mortgage is created, and here by the act of July, 1870, an express appropriation is made to be paid out of the special fund for this special purpose. There is no power or authority that can be granted to any man by an appropriation bill to disturb this sacred pledge, and I trust the promise of the Secretary of the Treasury will be made good; that the sinking fund will be maintained at all hazards, whatever other appropriations are disregarded and set aside.

And here I wish to say that an appropriation bill is nothing but an appropriation of "money not otherwise appropriated." An appropriation bill even for our pay is an appropriation of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but this sinking fund is permanently appropriated and permanently pledged, and must first be paid. It is like the interest on the public debt exactly. The sinking fund must be maintained inviolate, and no authority must disturb it. I blame no one for the temporary deficiency in this fund by reason of the unforeseen difficulties that surrounded us after the panic of 1873. Then the sinking fund was not maintained; but now that our attention is called to the law clearly and distinctly, it is apparent that thirty millions of the money received from customs must be annually set aside for the sinking fund, and no law in the ordinary form of an appropriation bill can divert it.

I have said all I desire to say in regard to the sinking fund. It is inviolable, and therefore one of the alternatives I have mentioned is out of the question. The sinking fund must be maintained. The next question is, can we reduce public expenditures. If the condition of our affairs were as they are stated in the Secretary's report in November last, there would be no necessity for any extraordinary provision, because the estimated deficiency for the next fiscal year being only eleven millions and eight millions being provided already by a reduction in our appropriation bills there would be but a small margin to supply by further reduction. An executive officer in the expenditure of two hundred and sixty or two hundred and seventy million dollars could very easily withhold here and there appropriations sufficient to make the accounts balance and come out even.

Now we come to another contingency. As there is a deficiency, more or less after the sinking fund is made good, the next question is, can the Secretary or the President suspend some of the appropriations until the deficiency can be made good? We are compelled to choose between the bill now before us or a suspension of a portion of the existing appropriations. I prefer for one to take the responsibility of the latter and to put it in the power of the President and Secretary to suspend so many of these appropriations as may be necessary to avoid a deficiency in the Treasury. It must be remembered that the Secretary has no resource but taxes; you do not give him power to borrow money; he cannot issue a dollar of bonds of the United States except in payment of other bonds. There is no resource for him but taxation; and if there is a deficiency, all he can do, like anybody else who is deficient in money, is to stop paying. He has no power to borrow money. We have not given him that power; but he has power to suspend appropriations when in his judgment the revenues provided him are not sufficient in amount to pay all the appropriations authorized by Congress. That is all there is of it. If there be a deficiency in the next fiscal year, and we do not pass a tax bill to supply it, as a matter of course there is no resource for him but to stop certain appropriations, and the President or the Secretary of the Treasury—the President in the first instance as the general head of the executive authority—is the one to stop such appropriations as in his judgment can be most readily postponed. You will find on page 7 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury a statement of appropriations estimated for the public works amounting to $26,299,469. I have no doubt it would be a great inconvenience to stop some of these public works. These include appropriations for fortifications, rivers and harbors, public buildings, and the like; but it is far better to do that than either to impair the sinking fund or to rush into hasty and ill-considered tax bills.

So then we do not leave him without resource. As I said before, an appropriation bill is not mandatory. It does not require executive officers to spend the money. That is not its form and never was. It is simply an authority, and the President is not bound to spend the money, and if the money granted him by Congress is not sufficient to meet all the two hundred and sixty or two hundred and seventy millions of appropriations, he must get along by using only those that are most pressing. He must choose between them, and he can refuse to expend money for objects that may be postponed until a more convenient season.

Still this Government is not at all in the position of an embarrassed debtor. It has boundless resources, boundless means, and boundless wealth. We should not hesitate to levy taxes, but in doing so we are bound to regard the public interests. The question is whether this tax bill sent to us is one that we can defend on grounds of public policy. Let us see. The first section of the bill levies what is called a very popular and a very fashionable tax, a tax on whisky. There is only one limit to the tax on whisky, in my judgment, and that is the amount that can be collected. That is an amount easily ascertained, because we have had long experience with this whisky tax and know something about it. Here is an increased tax of 20 cents on whisky to be manufactured in the future. It does not apply to that on hand. What is the first effect of such an increase of taxation? It is to give a bounty of 20 cents a gallon to every holder of whisky in this country, and that bounty must be realized by that holder, every cent of it, before the Government can get a single cent from the new tax. Here is the first matter to be considered. In this respect it is like all other taxes or increases of taxes. It is a benefit to the man who has the article on hand. What is that amount? According to the estimate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the amount of whisky on hand was 47,000,000 gallons on the 1st of January last. At that time we had the official figures. There were 11,700,000 gallons in what are called distillery warehouses and 35,000,000 in round numbers estimated to be in the hands of distillers, rectifiers, and dealers, making all together 47,000,000 or nearly 50,000,000 gallons. On the 1st of January, or at any time before the introduction of this act, whisky was worth 95 or 97 cents a gallon, the cost of manufacturing whisky being only 25 or 27 cents and the tax being 70 cents.

The market value of whisky, say, was then 95 cents a gallon. When you levy an increased tax on whisky of future manufacture you add to the value of that on hand the amount of the tax. Taking the tax at 20 cents a gallon no revenue can be collected until the price of whisky has advanced in the market to $1.15 a gallon. That is a very plain proposition, because as a matter of course no man would distill whisky unless he could get the tax he was to pay on it and the cost of the whisky back again; and the result is that the very moment you pass this act all distillation of whisky is stopped until the whisky on hand advances to $1.15 a gallon.

Mr. HAMLIN. How long?

Mr. SHERMAN. Men differ about that. I do not know how long. I do not think during this fiscal year we could get any more from whisky. Here, then, is a bounty to holders of whisky to the amount of nearly 10,000,000 gallons. Perhaps that cannot be avoided; but they will realize every dollar of that before we get any revenue. I will here state incidentally that the effect of stopping the manufacture of whisky affects very seriously the farmers of the West who have corn to sell; but I will pass that by, because I take it that the tax on whisky will not stop the consumption of whisky. I wish it would. If the tax on whisky would stop the consumption and banish the evils of intemperance, then I should be in favor of a tax of $5 a gallon; but we know that a certain amount of whisky will be made. The trouble is to collect the tax, and our experience has been that as you advance the tax on whisky you decrease the revenue.

I do not believe from my observation of the operation of our laws heretofore that this increase of the tax will increase the revenue. In this I am sorry to say I differ with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who, no doubt, thinking that his officers are all perfectly right and perfectly good, and somewhat magnifying his own power in the matter, thinks that he can collect 90 cents tax as well as 70 cents. We tried the experiment of that. We once advanced the rate of taxation from 20 cents to $1.50 and utterly failed. When the tax was $2 a gallon we only collected twelve or thirteen million dollars a year. Afterward, when we reduced it to 50 cents a gallon, we ran up to $40,000,000, or above that. So that our experience, the experience of men in the actual administration of the whisky-tax law, is that when you raise the tax you increase the inducement to evade the tax, and thus lessen the revenues of the Government.

I am very sorry to say it; but I fear very much if this increased tax is levied we shall have given a bounty to the holders of whisky, and we shall get nothing for the benefit of the Government of the United States from it; and I am free to say that I have conferred with many persons, officers of the Government, who feel and fear that this may be the result of the increased whisky tax; and if that is so, it is clearly wrong.

It has sometimes been said, and I have seen it in one of the newspapers, that Senator SHERMAN was very much opposed to the increase of the whisky tax, perhaps because the people of Ohio make a great deal of whisky. Not at all. The people of Ohio know that those who consume whisky pay the tax, but it does not follow the tax goes to the Government. The whisky may be produced in stills that do not pay the tax, and the temptation at 90 cents a gallon to make untaxed whisky is almost too strong for human nature. Whisky can be made in the mountains, anywhere in secluded places, in remote regions, the whole cost of the article being twenty to twenty-five cents a gallon, and if a man can get it out of his distillery into the market it is worth $1.15 a gallon. Even at 70 cents we do not collect all the whisky tax. It is estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that we lose 5 per cent. of it. That is more than we lose of any portion of our customs duties or any other branch of our internal revenue. If we lose that much at 70 cents a gallon, with all the machinery now organized for years, what shall we lose when we place the tax at 90 cents a gallon? Remember that what we lose by fraud is a continual temptation to fraud and a continual injury to the honest dealer, because there are honest men manufacturing whisky as well as dishonest men. Every gallon of whisky that drips into the market without paying the tax is just so much destruction to the honest dealers.

Senators, is it wise for us under these circumstances to raise the tax on whisky? I believe experience has proved that we have reached what is called the revenue point, and that we ought not to levy any additional tax on whisky, because we have levied now as much as we can collect. Not because I love whisky, not because the people of Ohio are opposed to the whisky tax do I go against this increase. On the contrary, the feeling there is all for it; but it is because as sensible men, charged with the public affairs, we are bound to bring to the administration of our duties good sense, and not be carried off by any wild phantom. Sir, if my fiat would destroy or prevent its manufacture and prevent its consumption, God knows that fiat would be given very freely; but we know as practical men that whisky will be made and drunk, will be consumed, and the only question is, how much can we probably get out of it in the way of taxation? I would be willing to vote any rate of taxation that we could reasonably collect. Experience has taught us that on the whole 70 cents is about as much as it will bear. I am not willing now at this late period of the session to disturb this established revenue, now yielding us $50,000,000, for any interest that may be in favor of the passage of this or any other measure.

But enough of whisky. Now I come to the tobacco tax. There is another article that is properly subject to taxation. It is an article that ought to be taxed as much as it will bear; but have we not taxed it as much as it will bear? We once taxed it 16 cents and 32 cents. We found that the 32 cent tax was evaded and avoided, and we were cheated. After strong appeals made by the dealers, by the consumers, by all classes, we finally, only two short years ago, agreed to reduce the tax to a uniform rate of 20 cents. Then it was done by the concurrence of the Treasury Department, the tobacco trade, and the men who raise the tobacco; and we thought we had established a fair revenue rate at 20 cents a pound and it was honestly collected and yields us $36,000,000 on tobacco in its various forms and being the second item of revenue in amount. Now suddenly, at the close of a Congress, without any opportunity to make discriminations, we are called upon to advance the tax to 24 cents. That 4 cents is about the value of the great body of the leaf-tobacco produced in this country, and much of it is sold for less than that. If we could collect it without any doubt or trouble or interfering with an honorable agricultural industry, we might properly levy it; but we have remonstrances from manufacturers, we have remonstrances from dealers, we have remonstrances without number from the little cigar-makers who make their living in rolling up this tobacco in the form of cigars, saying this will destroy their trade. Are we not bound to heed them because they are engaged in a business that the people who do not like tobacco dislike? Are we not bound to heed their prayers? They tell us "only two years ago you fixed this law; you gave us some security for permanency; now you disregard your own law; you raise the duty." I cannot answer that. I believe that the increase of the tobacco tax is wrong in the revenue point of view. It is wrong, because it does not treat the dealers, the men who raise tobacco, the men who manufacture it, as they ought to be treated by a great and powerful Government.

There is another consideration. While I am opposed to this increased tax on whisky and tobacco, I am opposed generally to this system of internal-revenue taxation. I believe the time is not far distant when a moderate tax on whisky and tobacco and our duties on imported goods will be amply sufficient for all the operations of the Government; that we need not extend our internal-revenue system. Indeed my hope has been that at this present session of Congress we should wipe out the little stamp tax now fastened on the people on bank checks, on patent medicines, on proprietary medicines, and on matches, consumed by every class of people. I had hoped that we could strip our internal-revenue system of all this tax and leave nothing but whisky and tobacco; but instead of that the effect of this bill is to throw more than one-half of the increase of taxation upon the internal revenue. The increased whisky tax is estimated to yield twelve millions, the tobacco tax about five millions, making seventeen millions more of tax in the form of internal-revenue taxation at a time when we had given out by our promises and pledges that we would take off this system of internal taxes as far as possible.

These are the considerations why I have not been able to approve these two sections, and I have no doubt my friend from Vermont will agree that if the Committee on Finance were at liberty to propose amendments to this bill we could give $30,000,000 of revenue from items that every member of the committee believes would yield a revenue without any serious additional burden and without raising any trouble whatever. The difficulty is that we are met with the question at the close of Congress with no power to amend. There are two or three provisions in this bill that ought to be stricken out; but we cannot do it.

Let us look at another fact. This duty on sugar, molasses, concentrated molasses, &c., is increased. Do Senators know that this is an enormous increase of a duty upon one of the most vital necessities of life, sugar going to every family. I have a letter which I take the liberty out of numerous letters I have received to have read. It is a letter from a well-known firm. I do not know but that I take a liberty in reading their letter, but I presume there is no secret in it. It is a firm which Senators all know, Grinnell, Minturn & Co. I will ask that this letter be read, showing the nature and character of this increase of the sugar tax, an increase of 25 per cent., making the tax on the various grades of sugar from 80 to 100 per cent.

The Secretary read as follows:

78 SOUTH STREET, New York, February 23, 1875.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Senator, &c., Washington, D. C.:

As the new revenue bill will doubtless shortly come before the Finance Committee of the Senate, we take leave to point out some reasons why the proposed increase of taxation on sugar should be abandoned and a tax on tea and coffee should be substituted.

The rates of duty on sugar, as increased by the bill, are equal to 80 to 100 per cent. on the present prices in producing countries—a scale of duty which is obviously most onerous; and this at a time when, as at present, the producing interests in foreign countries are so much depressed that no greater reduction of prices can there be expected. In fact the value of sugars abroad is already so excessively low that any further reduction cannot be expected, or, if actually realized, would inevitably be followed by diminished production, thus curtailing the comforts and impairing the commerce of the people of the United States. The effects of this discouragement of the production of sugar would fall with peculiar severity upon the natives of the island of Cuba, for whose misfortunes and sufferings so much sympathy has been shown here.

The proposed increase of the duties on sugar would, as we have said, raise the rates to 80 or 100 per cent., and, it is calculated by the committee, would increase the revenue about $8,000,000; while a duty on coffee at 3 cents per pound, equal to say 17 per cent. ad valorem, would yield about $9,000,000; and a tax on tea of 15 cents per pound, equal to 30 or 40 per cent. ad valorem, would yield about $8,500,000.

The statement of the quantity of tea on hand and on the way which was read in the House of Representatives by Mr. KASSON (and which we inclose and can indorse) is sufficient to dispose of Mr. DAWES's assertion that supplies are so large that the Government would get no duty from tea for an indefinite period. As regards coffee, the facts are notorious that the present supplies in the country are most exceptionally small, not exceeding two months' consumption.

The moderate and ad valorem rate of the proposed duties on tea and coffee, and the fact that the duties are uniform, (and not according to quality as in sugar, thus offering no temptation to fraud,) make them in every respect more appropriate subjects for taxation than sugar.

To this we may add that the prices of both tea and coffee have lately been so unusually high in producing countries that there is large margin for a decline there; and in our opinion there is every probability that the duties on these articles would raise their prices but little to consumers; just as the removal of the duty some years ago scarcely benefited the consumer at all, but was nearly all realized at that time by the foreign producers in the advanced prices which they obtained.

On every account, then, we know of no objects so well fitted to bear increased taxation as tea and coffee, and there are few objects less able to bear it than sugar.

We observe that Mr. DAWES insinuates most unfairly that the merchants who advocate a duty on tea and coffee are governed by their own interests in the advanced prices which they expect for their stocks on hand. Our knowledge of the mercantile community enables us to assert most positively that this is an unjust slur directed against a body of men than whom the Government has no more patriotic citizens, and whose habit it has never been to importune Congress for legislation designed to advance their private interests.

While we believe this to be true of the mercantile community to which we belong, we may add that the reflections of Mr. DAWES can in no sense attach to our firm in expressing these opinions on tea and coffee, as we are not holders of one pound of either.

We are, with much respect, your obedient servants,

GRINNELL, MINTURN & CO.

Mr. SHERMAN. This shows that the duty on sugar, when increased by this bill, will be from 80 to 100 per cent., and the discriminations of this bill are all in favor of the refiners. The increase of 25 per cent. upon the present grades makes a comparatively small increase in amount on the lower grades of molasses, melada, and brown sugar, and a higher increase on the higher grades of refined sugar or sugar that is partially refined which comes into our country. The great body of sugar that comes into the country is in the cheaper form, and then passes through a refinery. This, therefore, is an additional bounty or protection, as it is very properly called, to the refiner. The personal interest of the refineries has been carefully cared for. Sir, the present gradation of the duties on sugar has been made after a careful study and with the co-operation not only of the importers but of the refiners. Therefore there is no occasion to give to the refiner an additional advantage by putting on this ad valorem increase, which operates more severely on the higher and less upon the lower grades which they buy.

There is another peculiar provision of this bill that I have no doubt the Committee on Finance would be very glad to strike out, and I have no doubt my friend from Vermont will agree with me. Here is the definition of melada in the first proviso that tends to make melada cover what was previously called sugar, and it will create a disturbance in the construction of the law by the Treasury Department. It extends the meaning of melada to articles heretofore regarded as brown sugar, and thus operates again to the benefit of the refiners who import melada, being a cheaper form of sugar, and then refine it and sell it in the various forms of refined sugar.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Ohio I know means to be right in his interpretation of this bill; but I desire to call his attention to the fact that so far as his present observations are concerned I think they are unfounded entirely. So far as this proviso is concerned it rectifies a mistake and makes the administration of the Treasury Department at all the ports alike. At some of the ports heretofore low-priced, low-grade sugars have been called melada. If this proviso passes, the low grades which heretofore passed as melada will hereafter come in and be subject to duty as sugar.

Mr. WEST. It rectifies an abuse.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trouble is these provisos do not get in without some meaning. This is simply a bill to meet a deficiency in the revenue for a year or two, and it would not be necessary to load it down with provisos. But I will not go on further than I have. The Senate knows that this is not entirely satisfactory to the Treasury Department. I do not want to state what occurred. The first and last clauses of this proviso simply define the existing law, but the middle of it is a definition of melada and does contain a change of existing law. But I will not go into that further. Here is what I wish to call attention to in this sugar section:

And provided further, That of the drawback on refined sugars exported, allowed by section 3019 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, only 1 per cent. of the amount so allowed shall be retained by the United States.

When any importer or any person brings articles from foreign countries and they are manufactured into some other article, the article being made wholly out of foreign productions, the policy of our law has been to give them a right to export their products and to refund the duty that has been paid. For instance, when a sugar refiner takes a thousand hogsheads of sugar and converts them into refined sugar, he having paid the duty when he received the sugar, when he exports the refined sugar the whole amount of the duty paid by him is refunded to him except 10 per cent. This 10 per cent. is reserved by the United States for the purpose of paying the expenses first at the custom-house and the expense of the operation, and all the balance is refunded to the refiner or exporter. This is the general policy of the law of the United States; but here an exception is made in favor of the refiner, and instead of retaining 10 per cent. of the amount of duties paid by him to cover these costs and charges, we have only provided to retain 1 per cent. The man who makes plows and various other implements, locomotives and the like, has to give 10 per cent. of the amount of duties to cover the expenses and charges of the Government. There should be no difficulty about striking out this provision. Here is a discrimination that if left in will at once bring to Congress innumerable demands. I have already one or two letters on that point. I do not know whether my friend from Vermont saw this, but I think I showed it to him, for I received it before the bill was considered. Here is a petition signed by a large number of people in Brooklyn, demanding that molasses should also have the benefit of the 1 per cent. drawback instead of the 10 per cent. drawback. Here also is a remonstrance against this provision of the bill, signed by a man named J. S. Moore. I do not know him, but the letter is sent to us from the Treasury Department—I presume he is an officer of the Treasury Department—in which it is said that this little proviso set in here can only operate in favor of three or four refiners, and will give them quite a large sum in the nature of a bounty. The proviso is so framed that it does not extend to molasses, but only to brown sugar that is brought in and converted into refined sugar, and it will only inure to the benefit of three or four people.

I have said, Mr. President, all I care to about the tax on sugar. That is a legitimate revenue tax, and if it was thought advisable to increase the revenues of the Government, perhaps it would be well enough to do it on sugar. The fourth section of the bill is relative to the 10 per cent. reduction on certain textile and metallic fabrics embraced in a long section of the tariff bill, including nearly every article made ont of any textile or metallic fabric. It advances the rates to what they were prior to the law of 1872 making the reduction of 10 per cent. This is not purely a revenue measure. I doubt very much whether it is now politic. It must be considered that whenever this section passes every merchant who holds any kind of goods of this class on hand will be justified in advancing the price of his goods equal to the amount of this increase. The average duty on the articles embraced in this list of textile and metallic fabrics is estimated to be 44 per cent., so that it would allow the merchant who holds any of these goods in hand to advance the cost about 5 per cent., and he at once realizes the benefit of this advance on all the articles of this class in the whole United States. How many millions that would amount to I do not know. It must also be remembered that when this additional tax is levied it will advance the cost of the imported article to the amount of this 10 per cent. duty, and unless goods are imported under this section, as a matter of course from it the Government will get no revenue. It is therefore an advance of the price of all the articles on hand, of all that may be imported under the section, and of all that are manufactured in this country by our own manufacturers that come into competition with these classes of imported articles.

I would be willing for a limited time, say two or three years, to vote for a proposition to restore this 10 per cent., but it seems to me it is rather delusive. It will undoubtedly require the people of the United States to pay in advanced prices many more millions than would flow into the Treasury, because this tax, operating eo instanti, would be charged at once upon all the goods on hand as well as all that come hereafter.

Mr. President, what I think we ought to do is to give to the Secretary of the Treasury an increase of about twenty or twenty-five millions revenue by a simple revenue measure. That would give to him all that is levied on the people of the United States. Fortunately for us we could very easily frame such a bill. We could impose a tax on tea, coffee, and sugar. I know that many are sensitive about the tax on tea and coffee, and say there is objection to that. What is it? Every dollar of the tax on tea and coffee goes into the Treasury of the United States. The stock on hand in the case of tea is only 11,000,000 pounds. I have the statistics here. I am not giving the exact amount, but at any rate about sixty days' supply both as to tea and coffee. It is the cheapest form of taxation. There is no difficulty or dispute or controversy about it. It is levied in gold at so much a pound. The article is so bulky that it cannot be imported by smuggling. It comes generally from long distances, from Brazil or China, and the duties cannot be evaded. The money is paid in coin and every dollar of it goes into the Treasury. It is a purely revenue tax, and strange to say a tax on tea and coffee is levied by every civilized nation of the world except only the United States. Intelligent men freely admit that we made a great mistake in repealing it. If we had left on that duty on tea and coffee we would have had no trouble about our finances and would have had no deficiency in the sinking fund.

Under these circumstances, compelled as I am to choose between voting against this bill and voting for a bill which in my judgment is not a wise one, I will feel my duty best rendered to the people of the United States and to the people of my own State by simply giving my vote against the bill. I will not embarrass my friend who has charge of it by offering amendments; I will vote on it as the House propose it to us, as an ultimatum, as the only thing they can tender us, as the only thing they will agree to. I am willing to take a fair vote upon the passage of the bill without any delays or amendments or evasions. I will content myself with voting against the bill as an ill-advised measure imposing heavy taxes not wisely chosen and sent to us when it is impossible to secure its passage in a form satisfactory to myself and to the people I represent.

Mr. SCOTT. As a member of the Finance Committee assenting to the report of this bill, while I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Senate any length of time, I will ask attention for a short time as I attempt to follow the line of argument made by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee. He first tells us that this bill has a taking title, that it professes "to further protect the sinking fund and to provide for the exigencies of the Government;" and certainly, Mr. President, with the glowing words which yet linger in our ears uttered by the Senator on frequent occasions as to the sanctity of the national credit, no one can suppose for a moment that he will be willing, if he sees that this bill is a necessity for the preservation of that credit, to see it fail, however he may be impelled from considerations that may affect him because of the articles named by taxation to make the speech he has made against it.

But, sir, he says further that while the bill has a taking title it also comes with a demand of "Stand and deliver or die." It comes from the only body authorized by the people of the United States to send us a tax bill. For wise reasons the Constitution has provided that the subjects of taxation shall be selected by that branch of Congress which is most recently from the people and stands nearest to them. Whatever may be said as to the time selected for sending this bill, this is the voice of the Representatives of the people, acknowledging the necessity for revenue, and saying to us "Here is our judgment of the best articles and subjects upon which to impose taxation." If it be, then, a demand of "Stand and deliver or die," yet it comes from that source adjudged by the people to be the best repository of power for determining what is best to preserve the nation's life, to raise the revenues necessary to carry it on.

That this necessity for additional revenue does exist the Senator from Ohio himself admits, for he tells us, if I recollect his language aright, that we have but three alternatives: first, to repeal the law authorizing the sinking fund; second, to stop public buildings and expenses; or, third, to supply the taxation necessary to carry them on. He tells us also that we cannot repeal the sinking fund; the faith of the nation is pledged to maintain it. It will not do to say here or elsewhere that we may permit the payment to pass by for this year because we have paid more than the amount in other years, for the language of the law is that 1 per cent. on the debt shall be paid in each fiscal year. The language is imperative, and therefore the Senator was not too strong in his assertions in saying that a Secretary of the Treasury would disregard his duty if he did not take first from the customs revenues an amount sufficient to pay the sum set apart annually for the sinking fund. We cannot therefore repeal the sinking fund, and the Senator does not propose to do it. Shall we stop public buildings? Shall we stop other expenses? How is that to be done? There are certain annual expenditures that are necessary for the Government. We have the admission of the Senator from Ohio that the sinking fund cannot be kept up and these annual expenditures maintained upon the present revenues. Then passing, as we have already done, the largest portion of the annual appropriation bills, the President, according to his theory, is put in the position of making choice of the Departments in which he will stop expenditures. Here are public buildings authorized by law; money appropriated necessary to carry them to a certain degree of completion. Is the money already invested to be thrown away? Is the building not under roof to be stopped, so that the winds, the frosts, and the rains shall beat down what is already in process of erection? Is he to exercise this discretion in taking a part of the appropriations from the Navy, a part from the Army, a part from the Interior, a part from the Post-Office Department? Each Department will be drawing upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the appropriations that have been made; and if we leave the revenues in the position in which the Senator from Ohio admits they will be, the Secretary paying duties as he receives them to the sinking fund, and then a deficiency, the Senator would have the President driven to make this invidious distinction between the Departments.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Where is the power of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold the money when appropriations are made? I should like the Senator's opinion on that point.

Mr. SCOTT. I am answering the argument made by the Senator from Ohio. I was about coming to that point. I answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts by saying that so long as warrants are drawn and there is money in the Treasury, the Secretary will be bound to respond under the law. He must pay, and it will only be when there is an empty Treasury that the distinction will be made by the refusal. That will make it upon whatever warrant may come, and will make it to the discredit of this Government, when our attention is now called to the fact that we cannot maintain our national faith, meet our national appropriations, unless we provide the revenues to do it.

Now, let me consider the figures which the Senator from Ohio has used. He refers us to the report of the Treasury Department, stating that $22,093,748 would be the deficiency in the current year if we pay the necessary amount to the sinking fund, and that in the next year, according to the estimates then made, $11,920,914 would be the deficiency. But then he reads to us a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury written since these estimates were made, written on the 5th of February, written in the light of the experience he has had since the estimates were made, and upon the estimates of the current year he finds now in the light of that experience that he is wrong by $13,000,000. Instead of that deficiency being $22,000,000, it will be $35,000,000 more than the whole amount necessary to be paid to the sinking fund, which, according to my recollection, is something over $31,000,000.

Now, Mr. President, carrying into the next fiscal year the same causes that have been operating for the diminution of the revenue, the prostration of our industries, and the inability of our people to pay for imports, the falling off of the duties in consequence can reasonably be looked for in the next fiscal year. They have from these causes fallen off during the period intervening between the estimates and the writing of that letter on the 5th of February. If, then, there be the same deficiency of $13,000,000 next year arising from this cause, not contemplated by the Secretary when he made his estimates, instead of $11,000,000 for that year you will have a deficiency of $24,000,000, equal to three-fourths of the whole sinking fund.

But we are told that bills already passed have diminished the estimates some $6,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Eight million dollars.

Mr. SCOTT. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says the bills already passed have diminished the estimates some $6,000,000. And the Senator from Ohio says that those yet to be passed will, he thinks, diminish the estimates $8,000,000. That is an estimate only. In the face of the estimate, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the river and harbor bill which has $5,999,000 in it as it came from the House, has already pending amendments proposed to it in this body amounting to over $11,000,000. We all know that it is one of the most difficult bills to defeat. You will be brought to that question if this revenue bill fails. Your commerce must suffer for it; your harbors may be closed; obstructions in your rivers may remain. We all know the local interests that center around that bill. I have frequently heard since I have been here that it would go on the table; that it would be loaded down and fail; but it has always gone through. I do not know how it may be reported from the Committee on Commerce this time; but there is the fact that in the face of the estimate of $8,000,000 of reduction you have $11,000,000 of amendments pending for the purpose of putting them upon that appropriation bill. They may go on or they may not.

What the miscellaneous appropriations may be it is hard to tell; but can we afford, can those who wish to see this Government successfully administered afford to pare down the revenues to the million or the two millions or the five millions, and run the risk of seeing the honor of the nation tarnished by not meeting our obligations?

The Senator tells us that the sinking fund must be maintained inviolate and that no law can divert it. Then we are brought to one of two conclusions; either the obligation to pay to the sinking fund must be violated, or we must stop in a large measure doing those things which in the judgment of Congress are necessary to be done for the benefit and prosperity of the nation.

Revenue is needed, and I follow the Senator in considering the terms of this bill to raise it. He asks the question, Are the provisions of this bill defensible? First comes the tax on whisky, and the question is put, Can it be collected? The Senator very frankly says that in his judgment it is a tax which is defensible, and that the only inquiry to be put is, What is the limit at which it can be collected? All questions of expediency, then, are thrown out of our consideration. It is agreed that the article is a fair subject of taxation; that it is one the consumption of which will not be diminished by taxation; it is agreed that it is one which we have heretofore taxed and which has been very productive of revenue.

Now, what is the experience as to its collection? The Senator says that in 1868 when the tax was $2 a gallon the revenue was not collected. That is true; but that was in rather an anomalous time. I have never heard it asserted that the efficiency of the civil service in 1868 was exceptionally good. On the contrary we know the fact that it was exceptionally bad in that time. At that time a report was made by those who were most familiar with the administration of the Revenue Office, a report in which Mr. Wells joined—and I think Mr. Colwell and Mr. Hayes were at that time associated in the special commission with him. That report stated that the tax of $2, in their judgment, was too high, that it had not been collected, and recommended a tax of $1, believing that that tax could be collected. What was done? Instead of imposing a tax of $1, a tax of 50 cents was imposed and a change was made by collecting it by stamps, and there is an important consideration in this matter. Fifty cents was imposed, and from that time on the revenues from whisky have increased annually, and when 70 cents was imposed they have still continued to increase. Our experience has been that we could increase from 50 to 70 cents and collect the revenue efficiently.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will not contend that there was an increase from 50 to 70 cents when we changed the relation of the tax. When we levied 50 cents we levied a barrel tax and other items, making about 63 cents.

Mr. SCOTT. I remember and intended to state that the other taxes being added brought the tax up to 70 cents; but it is all a tax on whisky, and it is all collected by stamps. It is true the barrel tax and the capacity tax, as I believe it was called, have been added now, and we aggregate these taxes together and put on a little more than both, added to the 50 cents, and made it 70, and it is all collected by stamps; and now, since the tax was raised to 70 cents, the collection of it has been as efficient as it was when it was collected by stamps at 50 cents. Great Britain imposes a tax of ten shillings on every gallon of spirits, and she has imposed it for years. She collects it; why not we? The Senator from Ohio says it is not for the love of whisky that he opposes this tax, not because his people love whisky, but because he thinks this tax cannot be collected. Now what can be done in one country can be done in another. Great Britain is able to impose ten shillings—$2.20 a gallon, if I reckon sterling money properly—but at all events over $2 a gallon she imposes on whisky, and she has collected it. We do not propose to impose $2 a gallon; we propose to impose 90 cents and collect it by stamps; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue now administering the office gives it as his opinion that he can collect that 90 cents just as efficiently as he collects the 70 cents. I rely here, then, upon the opinion of two officers conversant with that office; I take the recommendation of the former special commissioner of revenue in 1863 recommending $1 per gallon; I take the opinion of the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue saying that this tax can be collected, and I add to that the experience of Great Britain showing that they collect ten shillings tax, and I say we need not hesitate to impose this tax for the purpose of raising the $12,000,000 of additional revenue which can be made out of it.

But another objection is made to imposing this tax; and that is that by so doing we confer a bounty upon the holders. That is an objection which I may as well meet here, because it has been made to every tax that is imposed in this bill. It is inseparable from increased taxation. I would be as loth to vote $10,000,000, or five or any number of millions of dollars, into the hands either of the holders of whisky or of any other commodity as any man; but if it be one of the laws of trade that increased taxation operates upon human selfishness, and human selfishness at once puts up every commodity to the limit of the tax, then we meet with one of the things that we cannot legislate away. This objection is applicable alike to cigars, to sugar, and to every other article named for taxation in the bill, and to any other that could be selected.

I come, then, to the tax on tobacco. The same objections are made as to the advanced price, and we are informed that remonstrances have reached us; from whom? From the manufacturers of cigars and tobacco, we are told. Well, according to the argument that is made here, they are the last persons who should remonstrate; this bill puts money in their pockets, according to the argument of the Senator from Ohio. They advance their commodities by the amount of the tax, and if we have no remonstrance from the consumers we need not be apprehensive about the effect that is to follow from the remonstrance of the manufacturers of tobacco. What I have said already with reference to the advance of the price of whisky applies also to tobacco. But the Senator says there were pledges given that two years ago, when we imposed this tax of 20 cents on the pound of tobacco, it was said that was the end of it. Why, Mr. President, has not that been said at the passage of almost every tax bill that has ever gone through Congress? Have not parties said, "Well, put it there, and let it stay there." Well do I remember that when we were told that the 10 per cent. reduction would settle the question of the tariff two years ago, we said, "Let it go, and let us not hear from it for five years;" but here an exigency in the public affairs has arisen which brings it to us from the House; and whatever may have been said by anybody, it cannot be held as a pledge that the powers of Congress would not be exercised to raise such revenues by taxation as would be necessary for the interest of the Government.

The duty is then raised on sugar and molasses, a necessary of life, the Senator says, and yet he agrees that it is a fair tax. There are some provisions in the bill in reference to importers that I would gladly see modified; but I believe, as the Senator from Ohio impliedly tells us, that we must take this bill to provide for public exigencies or now in the condition of legislation we can secure nothing. He sends up a letter to be read for the purpose of showing that we had better tax tea and coffee than sugar. I do not know, but I strongly suspect from that letter that it came from parties who are importers of sugar and do not wish to see duties put on it. I do not know the occupation of the gentlemen who wrote it, but their desire is that tea and coffee shall be taxed and that sugar shall not be. Mr. President, sugar, I think, we may fairly tax. We may fairly tax it because it is one of our own productions. We do tax it now, and this increase of taxation is to raise the revenue alike from all parties. The tax on sugar is one graduated according to its value. The tax on the lowest quality is the lowest tax; the tax on loaf and other high qualities of sugar the highest tax; so that those who use imported sugars of the highest quality pay the highest duty, and this duty of 25 per cent. is an increase upon all classes of sugar.

As to that clause about the drawback, there is some force in what the Senator says; but that drawback is an exception to the general rule of drawbacks as to merchandise. All merchandise which is entitled to go into our bonded warehouses when it is re-exported is entitled to a drawback, and 1 per cent. only is retained by the Government. This sugar which is manufactured by the refiner, it is true, may be said to be a manufacture; but this, while it may be a bounty to the refiners, is in the interest of our own industries, for the 10 per cent. of that drawback to that extent hinders their exportation. Taking this off, we pursue, perhaps to a larger extent than I would be willing to go if we could reasonably hope to amend it, the same policy which we do in allowing a drawback upon articles manufactured partly of domestic and partly of foreign materials; the same policy which we pursue in allowing a drawback on any foreign article which is re-exported.

Next comes the 10 per cent. section, which the Senator says ought not to be in this bill. I was rather surprised to hear my friend from Ohio couple with this argument his view of the tea and coffee duty. I have heard ever since the duty on tea and coffee was taken off that it did no good to the people; that the foreign producer at once put the tax on his tea and coffee; yet my friend from Ohio, standing here as much interested in that question as any Senator on this floor, reiterates for us the old argument that it is an advance of 10 per cent. on the cost of the imported article. I am glad that this argument is brought here that we can meet it face to face. First, there is a duty of 3 cents a pound on coffee; it is taken off; what is the effect? The foreign producer adds it to the price. That is the argument virtually. But there is a duty of 10 per cent. on woolens and other articles. It is taken off. What then is the argument? It is added to the price of the imported article, says the Senator. Is it true that human nature differs so much in the Brazilian and in the manufacturer of Leeds or Manchester that the Brazilian at once adds on the price of the duty to his production while the manufacturer at Leeds or Manchester is so disinterested in his benevolence that he sends us the goods as cheap as ever and it is the importer that adds the 10 per cent. and gets it? It is well to bring those two ideas as they are thus brought in comparison with each other to see how effectually the one refutes the other. We need revenue, and this is a revenue measure; and I trust we are not to be launched upon the sea of discussion as to the effect of protective duties.

These are the general provisions of the bill. The Senator from Ohio then closes by saying, "Give the Secretary of the Treasury about $20,000,000, impose a tax on tea and coffee, and every dollar goes into the Treasury; there is only a sixty days' supply on hand." Mr. President, where are the $20,000,000 to come from? The Senator impliedly agrees that we are now in a strait. No other bill than this can be passed. That he impliedly admits by his argument. I suppose I do not go far when I ask him, does he believe that any other revenue bill can now be matured and passed by both Houses of Congress? If not, then upon his own admission here is a deficiency of $35,000,000 this year, more than the whole sinking fund; and if this state of things continues it will be a deficiency of $25,000,000 next year; yet if we do not pass this bill how does he meet that deficiency after admitting that the Secretary needs $20,000,000? He does not meet it; he leaves the Administration to drift without aid. That being the case, I shall vote for this bill although there are provisions in it which I would modify if I thought it were possible to secure any other bill. This 10 per cent. restoration I have no objection to. I objected to the reduction at the time. I said then that I thought it was unwise and impolitic. I think in the experience of many portions of the country it has been so. I think nobody has profited by it. I know many people and the country at large have lost by it.

Now, sir, if there be any mistake on this subject, cutting down our appropriation bills as we are paring them down to the lowest limit which the resources of the Treasury will permit, I would rather run the risk of raising $30,000,000 as this bill proposes to do from whisky, tobacco, sugar, and the restoration of the 10 per cent. on duties, than leave the Treasury with the risk of $20,000,000 of a deficiency. I cannot see how the friends of this Government can stand by and admit that we shall have $35,000,000 of a deficiency this year and probably $25,000,000 next year, and yet adjourn without making some provision for the purpose of enabling the Administration to carry on the necessary operations of the various Departments. I shall vote for the bill, Mr. President, and hope it will secure a majority of the Senate in its favor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I attempted to get the floor when the Senator from Pennsylvania was recognized. He has said so much better than I could what I proposed, that I have now but a remark or two to make.

I believe that it is our duty to provide the means that the Government requires for its necessary expenditures, whether to carry on the Government, provide for the sinking fund, or proceed with necessary improvements. That duty rests peculiarly upon the friends of the Adminstration, and they should not be very critical whether the tax proposed is just as they would have it or not. In three days from this the responsibility of measures of this nature will be measurably removed from those upon whom it now rests; but our duty at the present session of Congress is to see that there is no deficiency of money necessary to be expended by and for the Government. We would be answerable for such a disaster.

What is the relief proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance if this tax bill shall not pass? The remedy suggested is that the President and the several Departments shall not respect the appropriations that are made by Congress, and thus be able to supply the sinking fund. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me that the proposition can meet with approval nowhere. If we do not mean that the appropriations shall be paid by the Departments let us say so, and not most improperly cast the responsibility on the President and the Departments. If we stop expenditures and do not make these appropriations for the public works they will suffer great damage, the nation will be the loser, and will be injured much more than the amount of the tax.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs us that there will be a deficiency of $35,000,000; and it is clear, if this deficiency exists, that it is the sinking fund that will suffer and the faith of the nation will be violated. The money will be paid for the expenses of the Government and according to the appropriations made, and the sinking fund neglected. I think I have heard the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in the strongest possible terms, declare that he would never do anything that would imperil that sinking fund, and never omit to do that which was necessary to preserve it; and yet he opposes the passage of this bill, which under the circumstances is the only means we have of protecting that fund.

We are told that we should have laid a duty on tea and coffee. Why, sir, we have been petitioned every day of the session from all parts of the country that we would not restore that tax. This bill complies with the wishes of these petitioners. We have had petitions every day begging that we would restore the 10 per cent. duty. This bill complies with these requests.

The only argument in opposition to this bill before us is that the whisky tax cannot be collected. I do not believe a word of it. We should hesitate before we make that admission against the power of the Government under which we live and for the efficiency of which we are somewhat responsible. When the tax was $2 a gallon we were not successful in collecting the tax, but we must remember that then we were obliged to select our officers under the most unfavorable circumstances, for every officer was tempted to secure his nomination by one representation at the other end of the avenue and to secure his confirmation by a different representation at this end of the avenue; a process not favorable to obtaining the best appointments. Now we have drilled officers, carefully culled and selected, and with years of experience. There is no doubt that these 90 cents can now be collected, and such is the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as he has informed me, and his opinion is the best authority on the subject.

But, Mr. President, suppose we cannot collect all the whisky tax; that is no reason why we should fail to pass the bill and meet the deficiency that is otherwise before us. We can collect the tax on cigars, tobacco, and sugar, and we can collect 10 per cent. additional duty. It is only a partial failure in the efficiency of the bill, if the argument is good against the whisky tax, which in my opinion is not the case. And let me say that the position which has been here advanced "that the Government has pledged its faith with the tobacco and whisky dealers," or with any other class of society, that a tax shall remain unchanged cannot be maintained. This Government never does and never can make any pledge in reference to taxation. To give up the right of taxation is to surrender the life of the Government. We have not and cannot impair that right.

Mr. President, the House of Representatives, which has the constitutional right to originate bills for income and to submit to us what articles shall be taxed, has given us its views, and at this time in the session I think that the party which is responsible for maintaining and properly administering the Government and responsible to thousands of bondholders all over the world that the sinking fund shall be kept inviolate, should not hesitate to vote for this bill just as it is, because we know that is the only way now to avoid the deficiency we see before us.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, if the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance had been made by any other Senator I would not so soon have undertaken a reply; but it seems to me astonishing, as conversant as that Senator is with the affairs of the Government, that he should have represented to the Senate that we have two hundred and sixty-odd million dollars from which the executive officers can easily withdraw an amount sufficient to supply all deficiencies. Why, Mr. President, there is not over a fourth part of the expenditures of the Government from which it is possible to make any deduction whatever. As I stated when I was up before, we can make no deductions from the amount paid for the interest of the public debt; we can make none on the amount paid for pensions. Can you make any from the amount of salaries paid to the judges of the Supreme Court, or the salaries of those who are upon missions abroad, or the salaries of members of Congress? Then we have about five millions or five and a half millions of deficiency for the Post-Office Department. Shall we stop that Department, shall we curtail the accommodations it furnishes to the public and refuse to pay out money there? Then we have various other provisions which are necessary and indispensable to the conduct of the Government in the ordinary course of administration. So that I say it is utterly impossible to find any spot where the executive officers of this Government can exercise a discretion by which any such sum as the deficiency will be can be distributed and withheld.

But the chairman of the Committee on Finance is fixed and unalterable that the sinking fund shall be preserved. If that is preserved, it inevitably follows that the whole of it must come out of appropriations made and to be made. I regretted to hear the Senator state unqualifiedly that our revenues for the last month or two had increased. The Senator knows that all of that increase was upon the hurried amount that was thrown upon the market in consequence of the apprehended increase of the tax on spirits. The distillers paid their tax in order to take the spirits out of the warehouses and thereby increased our revenue some $3,000,000 or $4,000,000; but on the other hand our deficiency on customs was nearly $2,000,000 for the month of January. If they should go on at the same rate for the remainder of the year there would be a very large deficiency; so that instead of there being only a deficiency of $35,000,000 it is more likely to be a sum much larger.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance represented that we should be paying an absolute bounty to those having distilled spirits on hand of $20,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ten millions of dollars.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Well, then, $10,000,000, or whatever the sum may be. I conceive that that is wholly erroneous. It does not so happen in any instance. Wherever the increase of duty or tax may be, it is impossible that the holder should at once realize the full amount. Large numbers sell their property at the old prices. Few only are able to make any present advance, and the price only gradually rises until it reaches a point of profit at the increased amount of duty imposed.

Then, again, when can we take the country and find less on hand? There is always an amount in the hands of the retailers. Would the chairman of the Committee on Finance impose a tax upon that in the hands of private parties, those not dealers, and those that are in the retail trade? I think he has always been opposed to imposing a duty on spirits on hand.

I understood him to object even to the amount of loss in the collection of the present tax on spirits of 5 per cent., as though that was a large sum. Does he or any other Senator suppose that we collect any closer the duties on foreign importations than 5 per cent.? Are there not large amounts that we know are always smuggled and always will be smuggled? Of course it is impossible to collect the tax upon every dollar's worth, whether the duties be customs duties or internal-revenue taxes.

But, Mr. President, I am sorry to have this bill condemned so much in general and in detail. What is it? It does not impose any new taxes. It is barely an increase upon the old taxes. There is nothing, absolutely nothing, in this bill but what there is an existing tax now imposed upon; and the bill merely imposes an addition to that as a revenue measure. Conceding, as the Senator does, and as every man that has any information upon the subject must, that this is the only measure which can pass, I cannot conceive how it is possible that any Senator can refuse it his support.

Mr. CONOVER. I submit an amendment to the tax bill to be called up hereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be received.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, while I am as desirous as any Senator on this floor to vote for any measure needed to produce sufficient revenue for the support of the Government, yet I cannot vote for this bill. I have listened with great care to the speeches made by the honorable Senators upon the Committee on Finance, hoping that I might get some light which would justify me in voting for the bill. It is presented as a measure of great necessity; and if I were convinced that it was so, that it was really necessary to maintain the good faith of the nation or to pay the legitimate expenses of the Government, or, as the Senator from Vermont said, the expenses of the Administration, I certainly would give it my support. My opposition to this bill arises from the fact that I cannot be convinced that we need this additional revenue. It is presented to us as a revenue measure alone. The object is to raise revenue, and in the main revenue to keep up the annual payment to the sinking fund, because if there be a deficit at all, in accordance with the argument made by all the Senators who have spoken on this subject in favor of this bill, it is a deficit created by the sinking fund and not a deficit as between the revenue and the expenses of the Government independent of the sinking fund. I hold that although it may be legitimate in the sense that it would produce revenue, it is not what we generally call a revenue tariff.

The law which formerly diminished by 10 per cent. the duties on many articles is repealed by this bill, thus adding 10 per cent. to nearly all the duties on foreign imports; and that makes this a protective measure. It may yield revenue, but it is also protective to the extent of the 10 per cent. addition. While this 10 per cent. is a protective measure to that extent, the large increase of internal taxation upon the great products of the West, whisky and tobacco, is a direct tax upon that section of the country. I know that the argument may be used and has been used and is always advanced, that it is no hardship for the West to pay this enormous tax, because the consumer returns it to the producer or to the manufacturer. That is only true to a certain extent, and is no more true than the argument advanced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] in answer to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the 10 per cent. duty upon foreign imports is an increase to that extent upon the price of the foreign article. All persons who have studied the operations of the tariff know that the position taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania on that subject is correct; that is, it does not increase the price of the foreign imports to the entire extent of the amount levied. It is a popular argument, an argument that I have seen in the papers of my own city time and again, that the duty levied upon foreign imports was just the amount that the consumer had to pay more than he otherwise would have to pay if the article paid no duty. All persons familiar with the theory upon that subject know that it is not to that extent true. But it may be and often is the fact that a duty on foreign articles will really bring about a lower price than if there were no duty.

I advance this argument not with the view of favoring a protective tariff, because I am not in favor of a protective tariff, but only to repel the idea that the persons who pay this direct tax upon whisky and tobacco here are entirely reimbursed by the consumer. They are only to a certain extent reimbursed; a large portion of that which they pay and pay to their detriment is never returned to them.

But again, if it were true that the consumers paid the whole tax, it would still be a very great hardship. The consumers of this article which we call whisky are of two classes in the main; first it is used for manufacturing purposes, and secondly as an intoxicating drink by a great portion of the community. That class of the community is its poor, the men who can least afford to pay a high price for that which they will use, and which gentlemen will use, not only the poor but men who are not poor. The fact is that the use of liquor, the love of drink, the use of alcoholic stimulants and wine and of all the drinks that will intoxicate man, has been coeval with the very earliest history of the human race. In all ages, in all countries, under all systems of civilization everywhere, among Jews and Gentiles and Christians, in ancient and modern times, intoxicating drinks have been used. It may be a misfortune, but it appears to be a law of nature; it appears to be a natural appetite. I am not here to commend it. I do know that I have heard the most eloquent discourses by gentlemen against the use of it, and I have seen those same gentlemen indulge in it very freely themselves. I know that it has been prohibited in some States, and yet their people use it most extensively, though perhaps secretly. The use of whisky, although a vice, is a vice which appears to belong to the race; and it is a misfortune if you make it too expensive upon the laboring community, upon the man whose labor cannot afford to pay an enormous price for that which he will drink.

I say, then, the section restoring the 10 per cent. duty is a high protective measure to the extent of 10 per cent. to the manufacturers of the East, and this enormous increase of the direct tax upon whisky and tobacco, which are articles used mostly by the poor, or at least mostly by the common people than by people of wealth, is a great hardship. One protects one section and the other injures another. This of itself would be with me a sufficient objection to the present bill.

But, Mr. President, are we in need of this increased revenue? What evidence has been laid before the Senate that there will be a deficiency for the next fiscal year? If we take the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made only last December, he says there will be a surplus of $9,000,000 from July, 1874, to 1875; an excess of receipts over expenditures of $9,000,000; and from July, 1875, to June, 1876, his report laid upon our table last December says there will be an excess of receipts over expenses of $20,000,000.

In his report of December last, which it seems to me must be the guide of Congress in a matter of this importance, he says the receipts will amount to $284,000,000 in round numbers, while the expenditures will be $275,000,000. Here are his words:

> For the current fiscal year, from the foregoing account of actual receipts and expenditures for the first quarter, and the estimates of the same for the remaining three quarters, the estimates being based on the assumption that Congress will not increase the expenditures by deficiency or other appropriations, it is expected that revenues will amount to $284,318,285.99, and that the ordinary expenses will be $275,315,489.42, which will leave a surplus revenue of $9,002,796.57 to be applied to the sinking fund.

There is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made last December. Again speaking of the year which is to follow, that is from July 1, 1875, to June 30, 1876, he says:

> If these estimates of the revenues and expenditures shall prove to be approximately correct, there will be a surplus of revenue of about $20,222,000.

Now, what has occurred to change this condition of facts? What information has been laid before the Senate or before the Committee on Finance to justify them in saying that there will be a deficit? We all know that owing to the prostrated condition of business, not only here but throughout the world, there is perhaps great diminution in the importations; but we all know that we have passed the critical period, and I am sorry to say from my observation that the importations this year will nearly equal if not quite equal those of last year. The first quarter's receipts of this year—we have it officially from the Secretary of the Treasury—amounted to $46,000,000. The total of duties collected on importations for the last year, ending June 30, 1874, amounted to $163,000,000. Forty-six million dollars for the first quarter of this year is more than a fourth of that amount, showing that the importations of this year will not fall off; and we know from the papers we read every day, from the official publications laid on our tables here, that the importations for the last two months have been very large and are likely to continue so. I have no evidence at all, and I do not believe a Senator on this floor has any evidence to justify him in coming to the conclusion that the importations of this year will be less than the importations of last year. I regret this; I wish they were much less. Our greatest means of resurrection from our depressed condition is to check importations, and we shall not rise from our depressed financial condition until our importations are checked and our exports increased. But this is not an occasion to argue that question; I only state the fact that we have no evidence that the importations of this year will be decreased. The first quarter is equal to the quarter of the year preceding. For the last two months the importations have been larger than they were the two corresponding months of the year 1874, as shown by the statements laid upon our table almost every week.

I did not hear a single Senator on this floor press the point that there would be a great deficiency between the receipts and expenditures. I do not think that a single Senator who advocates the passage of this bill really believes that there will be a great deficiency on that score. In do not believe it. I do not believe that the Secretary of the Treasury himself is of that opinion.

The object of this bill is simply and alone to raise a fund for the maintenance of what is known as the sinking fund, created by the act of February 25, 1862. While I would maintain the credit of the nation as carefully and as rigorously as any other Senator, yet I would not under the circumstances tax the people of this country to put into that fund some $35,000,000. From 1862 to the present day that fund has not been faithfully kept up. The Senator from Ohio who sits nearest to me [Mr. SHERMAN] said that a Secretary of the Treasury who would not maintain the sinking fund ought to be impeached. Then we would have to impeach the present Secretary, his immediate predecessor, and the predecessor of that predecessor. We should have three impeachments before the Senate in a very short time. Mr. BOUTWELL did maintain it to a certain extent. Mr. Richardson, the successor of Mr. BOUTWELL, did not maintain it at all. From 1862 to 1866 there was no effort made to maintain the sinking fund at all. Although that Department was controlled by the ablest men of the nation, by Mr. Chase and Mr. Fessenden and Mr. McCulloch, men of acknowledged ability, not one of them observed the requirement of the law of 1862, which authorized a sinking fund.

What is the object of a sinking fund? It is a means, a wise means, provided to diminish and ultimately to pay a debt. If that debt is canceled by direct payment, is not the object the same? Since 1862 we have diminished our debt upward of $600,000,000, and if we have diminished the debt $600,000,000 in that time, which exceeds the amount which would have been necessary to maintain your sinking fund, have you not complied virtually with the law? Have you not obtained the end aimed to be accomplished, which was the payment of that debt? In 1866 we had no sinking fund. We had none in 1867. The law authorized it but there was no fund provided; but from 1867 to the present year we have gone on, year after year, year after year, and paid a large portion of the public debt. Yet we are called upon to tax the people of the country when we know they are unable to pay any additional tax. The Senator from Vermont himself admits that there is a great state of prostration in this country as well as elsewhere. That being so, is it wise and proper that we should tax these people to the amount of $30,000,000 and $40,000,000? I say $40,000,000 this bill will produce, and I intend to show it before I am through.

This very year, while we are asked for this large additional tax upon the people, the public debt has been diminished. Says the present Secretary of the Treasury:

> During the fiscal year the public debt was reduced by the sum of $5,762,000.

If the public debt has been diminished to that extent, it is virtually the same as if that amount of money had been put in the sinking fund. It is asked where is the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to take the money in the Treasury and pay off the public debt and neglect to provide for a sinking fund? Why has not the sinking fund all the time been maintained? Our receipts in the last eight years have exceeded our expenditures by $541,000,000, exceeded all appropriations by the vast sum of $541,000,000. That has been appropriated to the payment of the public debt. Why was it not appropriated to the maintaining of the sinking fund? Why neglect that fund and pay off the debt to that amount, and then call upon Congress to increase the taxes upon a people who are already borne down to an extent beyond the power of endurance? It springs from a theory of government which I intend on this occasion to condemn. The object is to maintain in words the faith of the nation, but the effect is to build up a great moneyed class of bondholders, men of accumulated wealth, men who receive gold coin in payment of their interest at the expense of the people; and it can be demonstrated. Why has not this vast sum of money been appropriated continually and continuously to the sinking fund? But I contend if the public debt has been paid, as no one can deny that it has been paid, to that extent the law, the spirit of the law authorizing and creating a sinking fund, has been virtually complied with. If it has been virtually complied with, under the circumstances now surrounding us we should not pass a bill for the purpose of increasing the revenue to keep up that sinking fund.

The sinking fund was 1 per cent. upon our debt. Here again is a great margin for discussion. What debt? The entire debt, including legal-tenders, certificates of deposit, the Navy pension fund; or is it only the bonded debt? If it be only the bonded debt, as I think the law contemplated, we do not need over $17,000,000 at 1 per cent. The Secretary of the Treasury says within $31,000,000. A Senator on this floor—I do not remember which Senator—stated that we need $35,000,000. Thirty-five million dollars, capitalized at 1 per cent., would represent $3,500,000,000, which is away beyond our debt. Our debt is not $3,500,000,000; and yet 1 per cent. upon $3 500,000,000 would just be $35,000,000. Our bonded debt alone, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, amounts to $1,700,000,000.

Senators have said that appropriations have been kept down rigidly. Mr. President, it is my painful duty to say that I do not believe the correctness of that statement. I strove very hard myself, with other Senators on this floor, to cut down the loose appropriations made for the Army, to cut down the wild, extravagant appropriations made for the Indian Bureau, and we failed in every particular but one. I think we did cut down one appropriation $5,000 for the Indian Bureau. We voted upon bills here appropriating what were called miscellaneous appropriations amounting to millions of dollars for subjects that were incongruous, uniting matters that could not be united and grouping all together, an appropriation of $1,000,000 and $2,000,000, placing this large sum at the discretion of some one officer of the Government. We appropriated here for what were called incidental expenses between four hundred thousand and five hundred thousand dollars, and placed it at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. I will repeat what I said then, that in objecting to that mode of appropriation I intended no personal reflection on the Secretary of the Interior; and it does not justify me in making any personal reflection on him. He may expend the money with very great discretion and propriety for aught I know; but the mode of doing it is objectionable. It matters not who may hold the office of Secretary of the Interior, and he may expend the appropriation wisely; but this method of appropriation is wrong. With proper efforts our appropriations could have been diminished in a few items $10,000,000 or $15,000,000. With economy see what could be accomplished. The Secretary of the Treasury says there will be an excess this year of $9,000,000. He has paid $5,000,000 of debt without authority. Five and nine are fourteen. It only requires you to diminish your appropriations $3,000,000 to raise a fund sufficient to place 1 per cent. of the funded debt in the sinking fund, which would have been $17,000,000.

Mr. President, I am at a loss to understand why an effort should be made to confine the internal-revenue taxes to one or two or three articles, and those which are produced in my section of the country. Why not give the State of Pennsylvania a little benefit of the internal revenue? Pennsylvania is the greatest tariff State in the Union. Democrats and republicans in Pennsylvania are tariff men. It is a fundamental principle in Pennsylvania, and one which perhaps may suit their peculiar condition remarkably well. I have nothing to say about that; but if that be so, while the tariff is a great benefit to them, why not touch them with a little internal-revenue tax occasionally? How easy it would be for them to pay a little duty on petroleum? A vast amount of rock-oil is extracted from it in that wonderful State. Why not put a duty upon petroleum also? It would do a great deal, and if it be true that a large amount of this oil is consumed abroad and that the consumer pays the tax, the foreign consumer would pay the tax on petroleum.

Again, while eastern manufacturers are clamorous for high protective tariffs and obtain those tariffs from Congress, why cannot they be reached with a little internal revenue also? Why not put a duty of a quarter of a cent, or half a cent, or a cent per yard on calico or brown shirtings and brown sheetings, on cashmeres and shawls? According to their theory, the consumption would pay it and they would be no worse off. We of the West who wear these clothes would pay it back to them. But no; they will not do that. They will not submit to a tax, but they say, "We will tax you;" and at the same time when we complain they say, "You do not understand the matter; you are ignorant. Although we do tax you, you do not lose it; the consumer pays it." If it be true that the consumer does pay, it would be no hardship for them to pay a direct tax on all their productions and in that way equalize this burden. We of the West to-day pay in the revenue of the nation $100,000,000, when all the import duties only amount to $163,000,000. We pay upon the three articles of whisky, tobacco, and beer the enormous sum of $100,000,000; and we are told it does not hurt us. Unfortunately we consume a good deal of those articles ourselves, particularly whisky, and we have to pay it back. We pay this enormous amount, while you receive through your custom-house, or did last year, the sum of $163,000,000. You receive from the West by a system of taxes the sum of $100,000,000, more than one-half from the West. We say it is burdensome and it should not be done; that this tax should be equalized. The effect of this bill is again to increase a taxation under which our people are utterly suffering now, and of course I object to it.

A slight examination of the tables in the report of the Commissioners of Internal Revenue furnishes some curious and suggestive facts upon the subject under consideration, and exhibits this measure as most sectional and extremely unjust to the West; and as a Senator from that section I cannot permit it to pass without giving a few reasons why it should not. It is too late in the session, Mr. President, to do justice to a subject of this importance. If time was allowed me I think I could show to the Senate that this bill should not pass. First, because there is no need of any increased revenue; and secondly, the proposed increase of internal revenue is levied on the West and South, while the East, having the wealth, is not called upon to furnish any portion of it. To be plain, a more iniquitous, unjust, and sectional law could not be conceived. My object is to place before the people of the West the measure of justice which is meted to them by the present Congress. For years we have had in the West good crops; the health of that section has been good; nothing has crippled our energies; and yet at no time in our history have we been poorer than we are now. In many sections the people are not able to pay their taxes; and while this thing is so, here is a proposition to wire from them some thirty to forty millions more. And for what purpose? Sir, the purpose is simply to provide means for the sinking fund.

I will not argue this point at length at this late hour and day of the session. I will merely state the point that according to my understanding of the act of the 25th February, 1862, which provides that 1 per cent. of the debt shall annually be paid into the sinking fund—does not create an obligation to the creditors or bondholders of the nation—that this law was never to be either modified or repealed. It is simply a law which we imposed upon ourselves as a means of gradually paying the large debt created during the war. At any time we can repeal it, and if repealed would not affect our credit abroad. And if it did affect our credit, and yet was not a violation of the plighted faith, it would be better, under the circumstances in which we are now, that the people should not be further borne down by the proposed increase of the burdens which are already too heavy for them to carry.

Mr. President, the present bill I say will raise a sum of $40,000,000. Senators have stated the amount at a much less figure. Now, I wish to know, by placing my argument before the Senate, who is right and who is wrong on this subject. The duties upon importations last year, taking that as a basis, amounted to $163,000,000 with 10 per cent. off. Add 10 per cent. to that, and certainly it is equal to $16,000,000. Adding 10 per cent., therefore, you will receive $16,000,000 more if your importations are equal to what they were last year, and I take it for granted that they will be about the same. Our direct tax amounted last year to $100,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I doubt not the Senator from Missouri desires to be accurate, and I am sure he is conveying a very wrong impression. He would have the Senate understand that the 10 per cent. increase proposed here is to be on the whole importations of the country; but if he will look at the report on commerce and navigation he will learn that it only applies to the amount that was imported last year, which was $135,000,000, and it is not 10 per cent. on that even. It is merely the application of a reduction of the duty 10 per cent. Where the duty was 20 per cent. it would be a reduction of 2 per cent., where it was 30 per cent. it would be a reduction of 3 per cent. on this $135,000,000; if on any article it should go to 40 per cent. it would be a reduction of 4 per cent. This bill merely restores that pittance upon the amount of $135,000,000 which was imported last year, 10 per cent. upon the duties imposed and not upon the amount.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I have heard the explanation of the Senator from Vermont, and to this point I may stand corrected, but no further. I stated that the amount of duties levied last year was $163,000,000, and that if you add 10 per cent. to that it will be equal to $16,000,000. Nobody will deny that calculation. But the Senator says, and I have no doubt he says correctly, that this 10 per cent. of restoration does not apply to all our importations. That I presume is so, and it only applies to an amount of importations which is represented by $135,000,000. Therefore 10 per cent. upon that will be $13,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No, Mr. President, it is on the amount levied, on the gross importation of $135,000,000.

Mr. BOGY. The amount levied?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is the 10 per cent. of duties, whatever they may be, whether specific or ad valorem. If the duties are 30 per cent. ad valorem, it adds 3 per cent. and no more.

Mr. BOGY. We ought not to disagree upon a subject of this kind; 10 per cent. upon 30 per cent. would be 3 per cent., and 10 per cent. upon 20 per cent., would be 2 per cent., as the Senator well says. Add up all this amount and if you will go on, 10 per cent. upon $135,000,000 received would also be $13,000,000. The old law levied a tax, we assume, of 100 per cent. upon a given number of enumerated articles. The law of 1872, I think it is, which reduced that 10 per cent. used these words—it is a long time since I read it, but I believe I am correct:

That where heretofore 100 cents on the dollar has been levied there shall hereafter be levied 90 cents on the dollar.

I read it a good while ago, but I believe that is the law. I hope my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] will tell me if I am correct.

Mr. THURMAN. I can read the law to the Senator.

Mr. BOGY. It has been years since I read it.

Mr. THURMAN. As it now stands in the Revised Statutes, section 2503:

There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles mentioned in the schedules contained in the next section, imported from foreign countries, the rates of duty which are by the schedules respectively prescribed.

That relates to section 2504.

Mr. BOGY. Then I am correct in my statement.

Mr. THURMAN. Then follows this proviso:

Provided, That on the goods, wares, and merchandise in this section—

That is section 2503—

enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 90 per cent. of the several duties and rates of duty imposed by the said schedules upon said articles severally; that is to say—

And then it goes on and enumerates a very large number of articles—

On all manufactures of cotton of which cotton is the component part of chief value.
On all wools, &c., and all manufactures wholly or in part of wool, &c.
On all iron and steel, and on all manufactures of iron and steel. * * * * * * *
On all metals. * * * * * * * *
On all paper. * * * * * * * *
On all manufactures of India rubber. * * * * *
On glass and glassware. * * * * * * *
On all leather, &c. * * * * * * * *

The case is just this: section 2504 embraces almost everything and fixes the rates of duties; section 2503 embraces a part of what is in section 2504, and says that upon this part enumerated in section 2503 only 90 per cent. of the rate specified in section 2504 shall be levied.

Mr. BOGY. That amount was stated by the Senator from Vermont, and I have no doubt he stated it very correctly, at $135,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. That is obtained by duties; it leaves $135,000,000.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Vermont says that the 10 per cent. applies only to those duties which amounted to $135,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the Senator must not take 10 per cent. on the amount of that. He must take 11⅑ per cent.

Mr. BOGY. Of course I was not making an accurate calculation.

Mr. THURMAN. The increase would be 11⅑ per cent.

Mr. BOGY. The correct calculation exceeds my statement and I knew that, but I was making a mere round statement so as to be understood, that upon the basis of $135,000,000, which embraces all the articles upon which the 10 per cent. reduction took effect, this bill created an additional tariff of $13,500,000, and I do not believe there can be any mistake about that.

Then, sir, we increase the direct revenue in this way. The direct revenue levied from the West on the three articles which I have already mentioned amounted to $100,000,000. On whisky it is increased from 70 cents to 90 cents, which is a little more than one-fourth. On tobacco it is increased from 20 cents to 24 cents, which is one-fifth; and so as not to go into a detailed and tedious calculation, I assume that the increased duty is about 25 per cent. If we pay 25 per cent. more hereafter than we have paid heretofore, and we have heretofore paid $100,000,000, I do not think it requires a man who has made much progress in mathematics to cipher out that we shall hereafter pay $125,000,000. I do not think there will be any doubt about that. There will therefore be an increase of $25,000,000 in internal taxation. Now, $25,000,000 and $13,500,000 make the vast sum of $38,500,000, which we increase by this little bill. You cannot make it a cent less, and if hereafter your importations should, as they now and then do immediately after a moment of great depression, swell up to a large amount, and should be again what they have heretofore been, and should amount to $250,000,000 of duties, as was the fact three years ago, you would have increased the revenue $50,000,000 by this bill; and you cannot deny it. And for what purpose? Simply to provide a means for a sinking fund.

I will not argue this point at length at this hour and day of the session. I merely state the point that according to my understanding the act of February 25, 1862, which provides that 1 per cent. of the debt shall annually be paid into the sinking fund, does not create an obligation with the creditor or bondholder of the nation, and that this law was intended to be either modified or repealed. It is simply a law which we imposed upon ourselves as a means of gradually paying the debt created during the war. At any time we may repeal it, and if repealed it will not affect our credit; and if it did affect our credit and yet was not in violation of the plighted faith, it would be better under the circumstances in which we are now that the people should not be further borne down by the proposed increase of burdens which are already too heavy for them to carry.

I have on more than one occasion before said that in my opinion this act of the 25th of February, 1862, which provides that coin only shall be received in payment of duties, was not an obligation between us and the bondholders. Time and reflection confirm me in this opinion, and so of the law requiring us to pay 1 per cent. of the debt annually for a sinking fund. I have never believed in the wisdom of the policy which favored a rapid payment of our debt, not because I believe that a debt is a public blessing, but simply because the war had so crippled our ability to pay that it was not wise to attempt this now, but leave it to a future time when our resources would be more developed, and time had enabled us to recover from the losses imposed on us by the war.

The amount proposed to be raised for the sinking fund is thirty millions. This it seems to me is about eight millions more than the law requires—admitting the law requires it at all. The bonded debt on the 1st of September last was $1,724,229,800. One per cent. on this would be only $17,000,000 in round numbers. Besides this there is a debt composed of legal-tender notes, certificates of deposit, fractional currency, and coin certificates amounting to $511,572,000. We have what is called the Navy pension fund at 3 per cent, of $14,000,000, a debt on which interest has ceased since maturity amounting to $6,000,000. These three last items amount to $530,000,000. Although the act of 25th February, 1862, provides for the payment of 1 per cent. on our debt, it cannot be reasonably construed to require that we should pay on this character of debt.

It is true that the legal-tender notes are a debt; but it was not contemplated as composing a part of the debt requiring the payment of 1 per cent. for a sinking fund. The object of the law at the time it was passed was twofold; first, to maintain our credit abroad and at home, as we needed credit at that time to carry on the war; and also as a means by which gradually the debt would be paid. This latter fact gave us the credit we needed. But that day has passed; we are no longer in the market, and all efforts made to revive our credit have simply the effect of raising the price of our bonds for the benefit of the bondholder and to the corresponding injury of the people. Bondholders pay no tax, either Federal or State. This vast sum of $1,700,000,000 is held by a privileged class, and I am opposed to any system of legislation which is in any way calculated to increase the advantages they already enjoy. I would, on the contrary, favor any plan by which this favored class could legally be reached and made to share the burdens now borne by another class alone. To do this I know is difficult. It is to be regretted that in a Government like ours there should be any class relieved from its fair share of the public burden.

It is not my purpose to argue at this time this branch of the subject, although much could be said on it. At some future day I hope to be able to say something more than I design to do at this moment. I said at the outset of my remarks that the figures in the tables of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue were suggestive, and exhibited the fact that the West was already paying an undue portion of the taxes annually. The following figures are taken from page 120 of that report. The amount collected by the Internal Bureau for 1874 was—

On spirits	$49,444,089 85
On tobacco	33,242,875 62
On fermented liquors	9,304,679 72
	91,991,645 19
From banks—capital	7,387,160 67
Penalties and other sources	989,624 39
Total	100,368,430 25

Thus the total receipts from internal revenue were $100,000,000, in round numbers, of which $92,000,000 was raised from spirits, tobacco, and beer, and nearly all collected from the West and South. The comparatively small sum of $7,387,160.67 was derived from bank capital and deposits, and comes principally from the East and North. Here are ninety-two millions filched from the hard hand of toil, and seven millions from the coffers of hoarded wealth. Ninety-two millions from the poor man's necessities or luxuries, and seven millions from the rich man's stores of treasure. Ninety-two millions from the farmers and mechanics, and seven millions from the capitalists. Ninety-two millions from the overburdened producer, and seven millions from the wealthy consumer. Ninety-two millions from the laboring millions of the West, and seven millions from speculating millionaires of the East; and about one-tenth of those ninety-two millions from the crippled industries of the South, to aid in supporting the military occupation of that country and secure the utter subjugation and enslavement of the white race. And all this you do in the holy name of justice, liberty, and equal rights! This is your justice to the West and South, where the farmer is forbidden to sell the product of his toil to a neighbor, and when, too, he knows that every whiff from his pipe and every tip from his mug of beer is taxed to pay the interest on those untaxed and gold-bearing bonds of the eastern capitalist.

The heaviest item in our excise list, yielding nearly fifty millions annually, is a western production, commonly known as whisky. That article is already taxed 400 to 500 per cent. on its original cost, and now you propose by this bill to add another 100 per cent. to this enormous imposition. This measure, unjust and burdensome in itself, has not even the apology of a plea for temperance. High rates of taxation, so far from diminishing intemperance, only lead to the adulteration of liquors. The result is that the poor man must pay one-half of his earnings for a slow poison that will make a brute of himself and beggars of his family. As men will have some kind of stimulants, and particularly the poor and the unfortunate, as a relief from overpowering cares and crushing troubles, it is the part of true philosophy to seek out the least hurtful, and of true philanthropy and patriotism to substitute it for that which is more injurious.

We all know that the country, and particularly the great West, is laboring under great financial depression. Why this is so it is difficult to say. It is certainly a problem of difficult solution. My own idea is that this unfortunate condition of affairs grows out of our system of legislation, which is too much in favor of capital and capitalists and the holders of the bonded obligations of the Government, and not sufficiently protective of the interests of the producing class, particularly that class of persons who produce annual value from the earth in the shape of the great crops. For while these crops have for years back been great in quantity, yet there have been but poor and limited profits to the men who produced them. Yet during this very same period of time fortunes have been accumulated by a few men in the East which are fabulous in magnitude and remind us of the fortunes we read of in the Arabian Nights.

The amount of interest received by the bondholders annually is in round numbers very near one hundred millions; this is all received by them in gold coin. If gold is worth 12 per cent. premium, which is the average rate now and has been for some time, this class of men receive annually twelve millions more than if gold was not at a premium. This gives to this class a purchasing power of twelve millions more than it should receive. And while this is so we are all the time legislating for their benefit, under the specious pretext of maintaining and keeping up the public credit. While I would do all which might be necessary to protect this credit, I would at the same time not overlook the interest of the other class.

I observe great extremes rapidly growing in this country—a very wealthy class and a very poor one. Nothing can be more inimical to a republican government than this condition of things, and we should do all in our power to cure this rapidly growing evil.

Having said before, as I do now, that the act of the 25th of February, 1862, is not a contract between us and the bondholders, but simply an obligation which we prescribed for ourselves under peculiar circumstances and which we can repeal and modify at any time without violating the faith of the nation and that the same law does not impose on us an obligation which we cannot at any time change of keeping up the sinking fund, I will terminate this short speech by giving the very words of the law itself, so that the people can pass on this question and decide it for themselves.

SEC. 5. That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. SCHURZ. What is the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out in the proviso, on page 2, line 11, the words:

Not apply to tobacco on which the tax under existing law shall have been paid when this act takes effect.

And in lieu of those words to insert:

Only apply to tobacco manufactured after the passage of this act.

So that the proviso will read:

Provided, That the increase of tax herein provided for shall only apply to tobacco manufactured after the passage of this act.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offered that amendment at the moment the Senator from Pennsylvania took the floor, not knowing that any Senator desired to discuss the bill itself. I understand that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] desires to do so, and I wish to do so myself. Therefore I prefer that the amendment should not be voted upon until the Senator from Ohio and myself have an opportunity of speaking on the bill; and other Senators perhaps may desire to be heard upon it.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from Virginia would prefer to go on now, it is perfectly indifferent to me when I say what little I have to say.

Mr. JOHNSTON. O, no; I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this bill it is assumed will increase the revenues of the Government not less than $30,000,000. It is, then, a bill to lay an additional tax upon the people of not less than $30,000,000. How much more is not very easily foreseen. Now, it will be admitted on all hands that no such tax should be levied unless there is an overruling necessity for it. No tax ought at any time to be levied unless there are strong and sufficient reasons for taking the money of the people; but at a time like this, when there is so much stagnation in the business of the country and so much real suffering, to impose on the people an additional tax of $30,000,000 without an overpowering necessity for it, would be little less than a crime.

What reason is given for the imposition of this tax? It is said that our revenues are not sufficient to meet the necessary expenses of the Government. If that is so, and there is no retrenchment that can be made so as to bring our expenses within the revenue, then I admit that some measure of taxation is indispensable, for I for one am surely not in favor of borrowing money to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government; but I have not heard it demonstrated to my satisfaction that our receipts are not likely to equal our current expenses, and certainly I have not heard it contended, nor do I believe it can be, that retrenchment is impossible so as to bring our expenditures within our receipts.

What seems to be principally relied upon to justify this bill is what is called a necessity for keeping intact the sinking fund. The Senator who has charge of the bill says that the national honor, if I understand him, is involved in keeping that sinking fund intact and increasing it from year to year, according to the terms of the law. Now, if the national honor is involved in that, it can only be because in the estimation of the Senator the sinking-fund provision is part of the contract with the creditors of the country. Upon no other hypothesis could the national honor be involved; and if I show to the Senate that the sinking-fund provision is no part of the contract made between the Government and its creditors, nor an inducement ever held out by the Government to any man to loan money to the Government, then I think the Senator from Vermont must admit that the honor of the country is not involved in preserving that sinking fund intact. The sinking fund was first provided for by the act of February 25, 1862. Was that a loan law? By turning to it we find that it was not, except as to $500,000,000 of five-twenties.

The first section of the act provided that one hundred and fifty millions of Treasury notes should be issued. That was a provision for the issuing of the greenbacks—the first one hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks. That same section provided that those greenbacks thus issued might be convertible in sums of not less than fifty dollars into a 6 per cent. stock of the Government. That was not a borrowing of money by the issuing of the stock, but it was simply a provision for the conversion of the Treasury note authorized by the act into a Government stock and only reached the sum of one hundred and fifty millions. The second section provided—

That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to fund the Treasury notes and floating debt of the United States, he is hereby authorized to issue, on the credit of the United States, coupon bonds or registered bonds to an amount not exceeding $500,000,000, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable twenty years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

That was the first issue of five-twenties—the five-twenties of 1862, and he was authorized to dispose of those bonds. The third section prescribes the form of the Treasury notes and of the bonds. The fourth section provides for receiving deposits by the Secretary of the Treasury and the assistant treasurer. Then comes section 5:

That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues.

Those were the demand notes before issued.

And the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall be applied in like manner to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The rest of the act inflicts penalties for counterfeiting or having in possession counterfeit securities of the Government or counterfeit plates. If there is any loan provided for in this act, it is simply the loan of $500,000,000, the first five-twenties; and admitting, for the purposes of the argument, that that was a loan, the whole extent of the pledge of the Government in regard to the sinking fund extended to that loan and extended no further. When they were paid off, this law might have been repealed without the slightest breach of faith or without depriving any creditor of any hope that he had ever entertained founded upon this legislation.

Well, Mr. President, what has been done since that? Mark it, this money was to be applied to the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States. What was meant by "entire debt of the United States?" It meant either the entire debt, funded and floating, or it meant simply the entire liquidated or funded debt of the United States. If it meant the former, if it meant what the words import, the entire debt, the unfunded as well as the funded, then we have paid far more than what would amount to 1 per cent. of the entire debt from 1862. From 1862 to 1874 would be twelve years, and would make 12 per cent., and we have paid far more than twice 12 per cent.; yes, we have paid more than three times 12 per cent. or four times 12 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States if by "entire debt" in this section is meant the unfunded debt as well as the funded debt. But if you restrict the meaning of the term "entire debt" to the funded debt, then, as I understand it—I am subject to correction in that—the amount which has been paid since July, 1862, up to this time far exceeds 12 per cent. of that funded debt. Of course that requires us to consider what is meant by funded debt, and certainly I consider, in respect to that, that all that debt which was liquidated and for which the holders had certificates of indebtedness, whether in the form of certificates like the demand-notes or seven-thirties or five-twenties or ten-forties, may be said to have held a part of the liquidated or funded debt of the United States. If I am right in that interpretation, it is perfectly certain that we have paid more than 12 per cent. of that indebtedness since 1862, and therefore have in no sense broken the pledge contained in this act.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The pledge is 1 per cent. to be set aside annually to give assurance to our creditors and to the world that this debt was in the process of ultimate extinction. We were not prohibited from paying it faster than that; and if we did pay faster, that still did not dispense with the obligation of setting aside 1 per cent. every year. We might some years pay 5 per cent., but that would not alter the contract or release us from the obligation of next year setting aside 1 per cent. for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the point exactly.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg leave to differ with both my distinguished friends on that subject. The object was to secure the reduction of the debt at the rate of 1 per cent. a year, faster than 1 per cent. a year in fact, because the interest of the amount reduced was to be added to the principal, and you were to provide a larger fund for reduction from year to year, and that would reduce the debt in a much less time, as I will show in a moment, than one hundred years, which would be the time if it was simply 1 per cent. a year.

Mr. BOGY. I will state to the Senator that from 1862 to 1866 there was no effort made to observe the sinking fund, and it never has been faithfully observed as the law was construed.

Mr. THURMAN. What I say is that we are not to be sticking in the bark in this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will allow me, though I do not want to interrupt him, the act of 1870 removed any ambiguity there was on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was not any before.

Mr. SHERMAN. At any rate, if there was any, it provides distinctly—

In addition to other amounts that may be applied to the redemption or payment of the public debt, an amount equal to the interest on all bonds.

The act of 1870, to show that it is an annual application, provides:

And the amount so to be applied is hereby appropriated annually for that purpose, out of the receipts for duties on imported goods.

Mr. THURMAN. I intended to come to the act of 1870 presently. I was speaking first of the act of 1862.

Mr. SCOTT. I would refer to the act of 17th of March, 1864, so that the Senator may have all of them together. I read from the Revised Statutes the language of the act of March 17, 1864. The original joint resolution is to be found in the thirteenth volume of Statutes, page 404.

Mr. THURMAN. Where is it in the Revised Statutes?

Mr. SCOTT. Section 3699 of the Revised Statutes.

The Secretary of the Treasury may anticipate the payment of interest on the public debt, by a period not exceeding one year, from time to time, either with or without a rebate of interest upon the coupons, as to him may seem expedient; and he is authorized to dispose of any gold in the Treasury of the United States not necessary for the payment of interest of the public debt. The obligation to create the sinking fund shall not, however, be impaired thereby.

Reiterating the obligation, even although the interest was allowed to be anticipated.

Mr. THURMAN. I intended to come to that, and I will take that as next in order. I was speaking alone of the act of 1862, but I intended to take these other acts in their order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Speaking of that, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the language of the act of 1862, which says in the second clause of the fifth section:

To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862.

How does the Senator maintain that because the nation has been able, after increasing its own credit or reducing its own debt in the first year of that time, to pay 20 per cent. of the public debt? But, if you please, this act of 1862 does not still say that every fiscal year you shall put away that 1 per cent.

Mr. THURMAN. It does say so. What I say is that it is no contract with the creditors of the Government except those who are mentioned in the act in regard to the five hundred millions of five-twenties, and I do not think it is a contract even with them although it may be said that upon that pledge they have made some loans; but I do not consider it in the nature of a pledge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator must see that this is not limited in its terms to any five hundred millions.

Mr. THURMAN. I know it is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it was passed in the midst of a war when it was known by everybody that the debt of the nation must for the time being be increased and the security of the holders of the five hundred millions would be largely affected by the provision that Congress might make for any new debt that it was to incur. Therefore why is not the fair construction that which requires Congress in this pledge, if it be a pledge, to say to those who take the five hundred millions, "We will not only provide for 1 per cent. of your obligations but of all the debts of the United States, so that you will be sure that you are not going to loan your credit to a country that is going to swamp itself by future debts which will break down everything."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Before the Senator from Ohio proceeds, I desire to call his attention specially to the first section of the act of 1862. As I understand the Senator, he expresses the opinion that if this sinking fund has force at all, it applies to the public debt to the extent of five hundred millions only, authorized by the second section of the act of 1862. If he will observe the provisions of the first section of that act he will see that it authorizes the issue of $150,000,000 of United States notes.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator misunderstands me. I said that if there was any pledge to creditors that this should be done as here specified, that pledge was only to the holders of the five hundred millions, but as an act of legislation it of course would require that the money should be appropriated as herein expressed, even after the five hundred millions were paid, if there were other debts. I was speaking of the idea suggested by the Senator from Vermont, who has this bill in charge, that the Government has made a contract with creditors by this provision or has pledged its faith to execute this provision so that it would be a breach of the honor of the Government if we did not carry it out. In answer to that I said that could only apply to the $500,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think if the Senator will observe the language of the first section he will be compelled to admit that the obligation is still broader. By the first section of the act authority was given to issue $150,000,000 of United States legal-tender notes. Those notes were convertible at the will of the holder into five-twenty bonds, and that right continued until July, 1863; and those notes, when returned to the Treasury for five-twenty bonds, were by the authority of this section reissued. The consequence of that was that there was an obligation extending beyond the $500,000,000 of five-twenty bonds authorized by the second section of the act, inasmuch as it was made the duty of the Government to provide five-twenties just so long as they should be demanded by the holders of the $150,000,000 United States notes; and as those notes could be issued and reissued without limit, we are not put in possession of any fact which authorizes us in assuming that the limit was $500,000,000. The Government was bound to issue bonds again and again in excess of the $500,000,000 so long as the holders of the $150,000,000 United States notes should demand them; and the extent to which they did demand them I am not able to say. But it cannot be predicated upon any fact within our knowledge of the law that the limit was $500,000,000, even if the theory of the Senator be correct.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not see anything in this statute that authorizes the reissue of those notes after they have been converted into bonds.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The first clause of the first section is in these words:

And such United States notes shall be received the same as coin at their par value in payment for any loans that may be hereafter sold or negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and may be reissued from time to time as the exigencies of the public interests shall require.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is right.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Therefore, for our purposes, the issue under the first section was unlimited.

Mr. THURMAN. That is all of it immaterial except as to getting at some idea of what the legislation was. The point that I maintain is that this provision for a sinking fund is not a part of the contract at all—I am speaking now of the act of 1862 only; nor is there a pledge of the Government to the creditor that this sinking fund shall be maintained. What is the language of the section? It is simply the language of ordinary legislation. Nowhere is it made a part of the contract; nowhere is there language that expressly pledges the Government to the maintenance of the sinking fund. It is mere ordinary legislation.

When the Government undertakes to pledge its revenues, it uses appropriate language to pledge them. When it makes a contract that they shall be pledged it uses the language of a pledge, the language of a contract. But this section is nothing but the language of ordinary legislation. Why, sir, was it contemplated in 1862 when it was not known what might ultimately be the amount of the Government debt, what might be the exigencies of the Government—was it intended for all time to come, as long as there should be any Government debt, which might be just as long as the Government itself lasted, that the customs duties should be disposed of in this particular way and that the hands of Congress should be tied so that, no matter what were the exigencies of the case, there could be no use of that money thus received from customs duties except that specified in this section of the act? I do not think so.

And now let me come to the next law, that referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania—the resolution of 1864. That resolution simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the interest in advance of its becoming due. It simply allowed him to anticipate the payment of interest with or without rebate, as in his judgment might be proper. So that does not touch the question. Then we come to the act of 1870. The sixth section of it simply required the bonds which had been taken up to be canceled. It is the last clause of this section which is referred to by my colleague, and that is in these words:

In addition to other amounts that may be applied to the redemption or payment of the public debt, an amount equal to the interest on all bonds belonging to the aforesaid sinking fund shall be applied, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct, to the payment of the public debt, as provided for in section 5 of the act aforesaid. And the amount so to be applied is hereby appropriated annually for that purpose, out of the receipts for duties on imported goods.

That is just precisely like the rest; it is simply ordinary legislation. There is no pledge; it simply provides for enhancing the sinking fund by appropriating not simply 1 per cent. of the debt, but also an amount equal to the interest on the bonds that had been taken up and canceled. That is all there is of it; and so from time to time there is not one word in all this legislation by which the United States pledges itself that this law shall remain inflexible on its statute-book, no matter what may be the exigencies of the country.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio this question: whether with a provision on the statute-book guaranteeing that 1 per cent. of the revenue from customs shall be set apart annually to pay the public debt, if the Government afterward proceeds to borrow money while that provision stands unrepealed, that is not a pledge, and whether it is not in good faith and common sense a part of the contract, although the word "contract" may not be used? It is a pledge to every man who afterward loans money to the Government that 1 per cent. shall be set aside annually to pay that debt, and he lends his money on the faith of that pledge; and that does make it a part of the contract.

Mr. THURMAN. It is no more a part of the contract than it is a part of the contract that the customs duties shall not be reduced in amount. The Senator might just as well argue that it is a part of the contract between the United States and these creditors that the customs duties should be maintained at the high rate they were when this law passed. There is no such contract. It is only when a government by its statute expressly and distinctly declares that it shall be a part of the contract or distinctly and expressly pledges itself that it will pursue a particular course to create a fund or to pay off an indebtedness that there is any pledge whatsoever. It is no pledge of the revenues of the Government at all in any proper sense. I grant, however, that while it is no pledge in any proper and legal sense of the term, it ought not to be annulled. I am in favor of maintaining the sinking fund just as much as the Senator is, not because it is a pledge, but because I think it is good policy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then why does not the Senator vote for some bill to provide for maintaining it?

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if the act of 1870 does not regard it as in the nature of an obligation?

Mr. THURMAN. I have read the act of 1870.

Mr. MORTON. "The obligation to create the sinking fund shall not, however, be impaired thereby." It recognizes it as an obligation, something more than a mere act of legislation.

Mr. THURMAN. What does the Senator read from?

Mr. MORTON. From the act of 1864, section 3699 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. THURMAN. The words are:

The obligation to create the sinking fund shall not, however, be impaired thereby

That is anticipating the payment of interest to be sure, but what "obligation?" The obligation that rests upon the Government to discharge its duties so as to create a sinking fund; not an obligation to the creditor. I put it to the Senate once more, can we not reduce the tariff, can we not reduce it one-half or more; if the interests of the country require that we should abolish it altogether, if you can suppose such a case as that, can we not abolish it altogether?

Mr. MORTON. There is no statement in the law to the effect that the tariff shall not be varied, that it may not be reduced or that it may not be increased; but the pledge is that, whatever the tariff shall be, whether higher or lower, 1 per cent. shall be annually set aside for this purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to suggest to my friend from Ohio—I see he smiles—but perhaps he dislikes to be interrupted.

Mr. THURMAN. No; go on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do it in the interest of getting at the real truth of this matter, which my friend is evidently after. He says, can we not abolish the tariff altogether? So we can; we have the power; and the same question has been made in many of the States in cases which have been drawn into judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States in respect to statutes of limitations and statutes enabling creditors to compel debtors to pay their debts. When a particular debt is incurred by a municipal corporation and the law of a State stands so and so, the States afterward, on account of local pressure and prejudice and disturbance, change their laws so that the creditor does not have substantially the same means of enforcing his rights against the debtor that he had before the State passed the law. The highest judicial tribunal of the land has decided over and over again, if I am right in my understanding of their decisions, that legislation of that character, which essentially affects the security of the fund of the debtor which the creditor had a right to look to under the law as it existed when he entered into the contract or took the bond, cannot be impaired. Now, it seems to me that is just so with this. It may be that we have a right to impair the obligation of contracts; but if the decisions of the Supreme Court are to be taken as a guide for the interpretation of the law, then in a moral sense we have no more right to impair the obligation of the contract contained in the act of 1862 and of 1864 and the later act reaffirming it of 1870 than a State has; and if we do it, we impair, if not the technical obligation of the contract, the obligation of the public faith to every person in the land and out of it who has invested on the faith of reading this statute that 1 per cent. of this debt should be provided for every single year. That is the way it strikes me. Now, the Senator may say this does not impair the obligation of the contract, because it is not a contract. So be it; it is not a technical contract, but it certainly held out to the world, to the people of the United States, and to all others who had any money to lend, that in order to provide for its payment the Congress of the United States would provide that we should look to the time when it became due by laying aside 1 per cent. of it every single year. If we do more, we do so much the better; but every year 1 per cent. should be laid aside. Now, I would like to hear the Senator's observation on that, because I only wish to get at the true construction of this matter.

Mr. THURMAN. I have first to express my great satisfaction at finding that the Senator from Vermont is learning to have some little regard for the decisions of the Supreme Court; but passing that, it does not seem to me that the Senator has asked a question which it is at all difficult to answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think I have. I think it is very easy to answer.

Mr. THURMAN. He really commences by begging the question; because if he does not beg the question, then the case he puts has no application here. He begs the question by supposing that this is a contract. If it is a contract, there is an end of the question; nobody is in favor of repudiating it. If it is a pledge, there is an end of the discussion; nobody is in favor of repudiating any pledge. It is simply begging the question. The question is, is it a contract? In the case to which the Senator alludes, the case of the mortgages that came up from Illinois, there was a contract; there was no question of contract or no contract; there was a plain contract; and the Supreme Court said that if the State of Illinois passed a law which in fact deprived the mortgagee of his remedy on the contract, destroyed his remedy, that was one mode of impairing the obligation of the contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but the Senator forgets or has not come to the point. I refer to the additional decisions of the Supreme Court, which have said that where the tax laws of a State had been interpreted by the supreme court of the State to hold that the bonds or the stock of a particular railway company, under existing laws, could not be taxed beyond a certain amount on account of provisions in the charter, and then the stock or the bonds, or whatever they might be, changed hands and came into the hands of people who, acting upon the then apparent state of the law, had invested, it was not competent for the State to reverse this judgment and to proceed upon the idea that they might tax or impose further burdens. I ask his attention to that in connection with this act of 1862. It holds out to everybody who is to take these bonds, for otherwise there was no need to provide for it at all, so far as upholding the public credit is concerned, that 1 per cent. of them should be provided for every year by raising money to lay aside, so as to be ready to meet them in the end. That being the state of the case, people invest and take the bonds and uphold the credit of the Government, and enable us to carry on the war against the rebellion. Now, the Senator says that is not even a pledge; it is nothing at all; and the moment these people have got the bonds you may turn round and say, "We will not lay aside anything."

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is as unfortunate in his last citation of authority as he was in his first. In the case to which he refers the decision does not bear at all upon the question of whether stock in the banks had changed hands. The case came from Ohio. The charter of the State Bank of Ohio provided what should be the rate of taxation upon the bank, and that no more than that should be levied. Very well. Afterward the Legislature levied a greater tax. The Supreme Court decided that the act levying the greater tax impaired the obligation of the contract, holding that the charter of the bank was a contract pursuant of the decision in the Dartmouth College case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator misunderstands the class of cases to which I refer. They are those decided within half a dozen years in the Supreme Court touching more recent tax cases and more investments under the construction of the laws of particular States which then obtained and which then appeared to be the law, and the supreme courts of those States afterward thought was not the law, and the question was whether the people who had invested on the faith of the then interpretation of the law were to be thrown out by a reverse interpretation afterward.

Mr. THURMAN. The question of a judicial interpretation of the law upon the faith of which people had made investments has nothing to do with this point. But even then the Supreme Court has never laid down the doctrine as broadly as my friend supposes, that if the supreme court of a State construes a statute and people invest upon that construction the State is bound to that construction forever. The Supreme Court has not said that; but the Supreme Court has said that where the decisions of the supreme court of the State were contradicted, then it was not bound to follow the last decision. That is all it said. It said so in the case from Ohio; it said so in the Dubuque case; but that really has nothing to do with this at all. The moment you say that the Government is bound in honor to maintain this provision precisely as it is here, that is, this legislation which must last no matter what may be the condition of the country, that very moment there is an end of all discussion. Was it so understood? It is said at once that from 1862 to 1866 no attention at all was paid to this provision, and yet during that time we made the chief part of our loans. During the very time when no attention whatever was paid to it, men lent their money to the Government; and now it is said that they lent their money to the Government on the strength of this provision in the statute when they saw themselves that the Government was paying not the slightest attention whatsoever to it. No, Mr. President, that will not do.

Again, let us see what will be the effect of this. It is stated by Mr. Richardson in his book on the public debt:

> The great revenues of the country in excess of the expenditures have enabled the Secretary to purchase bonds much more extensively than the sinking-fund law absolutely required; and the debt has been more rapidly reduced than by the operation of that fund alone.

So that according to the statement made in this book, which is less than two years old, we have extinguished more of the debt than this sinking-fund provision required us to do. We have substantially complied with it and more than complied with it up to this time; and what I maintain is that there is no necessity at this particular moment to levy additional taxes in order to maintain the public credit by appropriating twenty millions or more to this sinking fund for the coming year. I am not opposing the sinking fund. I am not opposing any security, or hope, or pledge, that any public creditor may have, for I am as much opposed to repudiation as any man on this floor, and always have been.

But again, although my friends seem to be very sensitive about this matter, as if there were some danger, let me tell them that the national-banks if they continue their national-bank system will never allow this thing to be executed. What will be the effect of this sinking fund? We have it here in Richardson's book. He estimates that if this law be executed it will pay off the entire debt in thirty years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does he make that out, paying 1 per cent. a year?

Mr. THURMAN. That is the way he works it out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is rather a puzzle to me.

Mr. THURMAN. I read from page 85 of Richardson's book:

> But the sinking fund itself will extinguish the entire national debt in about thirty years or soon after the close of the nineteenth century, the exact time depending upon the price at which the purchases may be made in the future.

If the debt were all wiped out, where is the foundation for your national banks or for your national-bank currency? The whole national-bank system is founded upon the national debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that the national-bank system ought to be upheld by keeping up the debt of the United States?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; I do not. I am for paying off the debt; but what I am saying is that these national bankers never within my life will allow this national debt to be paid off.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator mean by saying "allow?" Suppose we follow the law, what have the national banks to do with it?

Mr. THURMAN. Because they will be strong enough to defeat the payment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They may be with the Senator, but not with me.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio, for he is evidently anxious to get at the true meaning of the law. Throwing aside the question of contract with the holder of the bonds, what is the view of this legislation as creating a duty on the Secretary of the Treasury, compelling him each year to pay out of the gold duties an amount equal to 1 per cent. of the debt?

Mr. THURMAN. I think it imposes that duty upon him. It seems to me it is clear enough that it imposes that duty upon him; otherwise the law is nugatory. This money is to be applied thus and so. Unless that be repealed or altered, it would be his duty, unless there were legislation that was inconsistent with it, so that he could not execute it. If he can execute it, it is his duty to execute it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose he has $100,000,000 of resources, and it takes $50,000,000; for illustration—I may not be anywhere near right about the sum it does take, but it illustrates the idea—he takes $50,000,000 to provide for this 1 per cent., and the appropriations for other objects are another $100,000,000 more; what is he to do? Is he to scale the whole thing, or is he to obey this statute if he pleases and leave the deficiency to fall upon the salaries of Senators and Members of Congress, and so on?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think he would do that for fear he would be impeached.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But what ought he to do?

Mr. THURMAN. Really I am not Secretary of the Treasury. It will be time enough when I am Secretary of the Treasury to ask me about his duties. He has the Attorney-General to aid him, and a Department of Justice and a Judiciary Committee in each House, and really he need not ask me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very sorry that my friend is so much less clear upon this point than he is upon all the others.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been interrupted so much that really the little speech I intended to make of about twenty minutes I have lost almost entirely the thread of; but my friends seem to be terribly alarmed that the public credit is in danger. I tell them that the public credit is not in the slightest danger. You put it in your Constitution as clearly as it can be, "the validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned." The validity of the public debt of the United States shall not be questioned and nobody wants to question it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You question the means of doing it. A bankrupt might say he did not question the validity of his debts.

Mr. THURMAN. What I am opposed to is that, under pretense of a necessity for keeping up this sinking fund or making it whole, as it is called, $30,000,000 of taxes are to be forthwith levied on the people of the United States when we have more than complied with the law, when we have already paid more than the law required, when we have already reduced the debt far more than 12 per cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In each fiscal year?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care whether it is in each fiscal year or not. That is a mere sticking in the bark. All that the creditor could honestly ask was that you should reduce it at least at the rate of 1 per cent. a year, and after the act of 1870, and which by the way was a voluntary thing on our part, that the interest upon the amount of the sinking fund should also be added as an additional reduction. Therefore I say, Mr. President, that if we have reduced the debt more than it would have been reduced by the mere operation of the sinking-fund law, the creditor has no right to complain whatsoever, and the mere reduction year by year is not of the essence of this contract when we have done the substantial thing which is required by the law, and when there is no necessity at this moment to be imposing thirty-odd millions additional taxes upon the people.

I will stand as firmly as any man against anything that is calculated to destroy the credit of the Government or to do injustice to its creditors; I will not tolerate repudiation in any form or shape whatever; but I maintain that you do not tolerate repudiation in any form or break any pledge you have given when you say that having already reduced the debt far more than 12 per cent. we will not tax the people thirty-odd millions in order to make good, as it is called, the sinking fund.

But, sir, I have something to say further upon this bill. I object to the bill in every section. What is the first section? It increases the tax on distilled spirits. The next section increases the tax on tobacco. The third section increases the duty on sugar, and the fourth section adds 11½ per cent. to duties that are now payable upon a very large portion, the largest portion, of the imports into the United States. This, then, is an increase of 11½ per cent. of the existing duties, and an increase of 20 cents a gallon on whisky, and an increase of 25 per cent. or more upon tobacco. Now, is that right?

It has been said that in the end all taxes are paid by the consumer. That, as a general proposition, is true, although there are, it has been supposed, some exceptions to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A good many.

Mr. THURMAN. A good many, I think, in practice arising from causes that will occur to anybody who will think about the subject. The general principle, however, is correct that the person who has a thing to sell puts the tax into the price, and that therefore in the end the tax is upon the consumer. But that only applies to a person who has something to sell, so that he can add the tax to the price. If he is the consumer himself, of course he cannot do any such thing as that. But while that is true in the first instance, other persons have to pay the tax; and where the tax is heavy upon any particular industry, that industry is loaded down by it and discouraged. Now let us see how it is here with the tax on distilled spirits. The amount raised in the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, amounted to $50,815,844. In round numbers it amounted to $51,000,000 tax on distilled spirits. By whom was that tax paid in the first instance? Illinois paid $13,727,790 of that tax; Ohio, $10,887,498; Indiana, $5,095,229; Kentucky, $3,660,104; so that those four States alone paid $33,370,621, or more than two-thirds of that tax.

Mr. SCOTT. They did not drink all the whisky?

Mr. THURMAN. No; they did not drink all the whisky that was made by any manner of means. There was now and then a good Pennsylvanian who came over and bought some whisky, and there were other people who bought the whisky; but in the first instance Illinois paid $13,000,000, Ohio $10,000,000, Indiana $5,000,000, Kentucky over three and a half millions, and that tax must be raised, because not a single gallon of that whisky could go out of bond and be delivered to the purchaser, if I am right about the law, until the tax was paid. That is so, is it not?

Mr. SCOTT. I so understand.

Mr. THURMAN. The tax, therefore, has to be paid. See what a large sum of money is therefore required to be raised in the first instance by the manufacturer. I know very well, I know in my own State that when the tax was put up to $2, it closed almost every distillery in the State of Ohio. Every one of the great distilleries was closed, and when they were closed the market for corn, the market for rye, the market for barley was most seriously affected throughout the whole southern part of Ohio.

This is an unfair tax. I grant that distilled spirits are a proper subject of taxation and one of the best subjects of taxation we could have, because the article is certain to produce a large revenue; but I do say at the same time that it is a tax extremely onerous upon those sections of the country where the distilling takes place, because in the first instance they are compelled to pay so large a sum of money.

Then come to tobacco. The same remarks will apply to tobacco, not to the same extent, it is true, because there are more States engaged in tobacco raising. But the State where I live is now getting to be a very large tobacco State. The tax on tobacco already ranges from 100 to 400 per cent. of the cost of the article, a uniform tax of 20 cents on tobacco that can be purchased at $5 a hundred—400 per cent. on that tobacco.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not unpleasantly interrupt my friend, he has stated that the tax on whisky or distilled spirits is paid in the first instance by the producer. Now, was it not the law, and is it not yet the law, that this tax only has to be paid when it is taken out of bond, that is, when the act of sale in substance actually takes place; and therefore so far as the buyer, the consumer pays it at all, which in respect to this tax I think he pays entirely, does he not pay the tax into the hands of the seller before the seller is obliged to pay the tax to the Government?

Mr. THURMAN. No; he does not. That would be the case if all sales of whisky were cash sales; but they are not. They are very far from being cash sales.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They may be cash sales; it is a question for the seller to determine how he will sell.

Mr. THURMAN. He sells as he can get a market, and if one manufacturer is accustomed to sell on time he compels the other manufacturers to sell on time. The tax has to be paid in the first instance almost entirely by the producer, and is an onerous burden upon that particular interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not the seller usually require that a cash payment shall be made sufficient to meet the tax?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know that he does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think he does.

Mr. THURMAN. I never was in the business, and I do not know that he does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator seems to have been in the midst of the business, if not of it.

Mr. THURMAN. It is a large business in my State. It is a business that interests not only those engaged in the production of spirits but it interests those who have corn to sell, who have barley to sell, who have rye to sell; and I know what was the effect of the heavy taxation before, and I anticipate from this, not a destruction of all the distilleries for the time being or a suspension such as took place when the tax was raised to $2, but a suspension of some of them and a less production.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What year does the Senator refer to?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know; the Senator was here, I think, when the tax was raised to $2. It shut every distillery in Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long did it reduce the price of corn?

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot say how long; I do not remember. Then, as I said, in respect to tobacco here is a tax already 400 per cent., and why should you put any more tax on that? Now it is proposed to increase the tax upon spirits, upon tobacco, upon sugar, and then upon almost every necessary of life that pays customs duties, in order to do what? In order to make, it is said, the sinking fund intact. When the bonds of the Government are already 12 or 15 per cent. above par in gold——

Mr. EDMUNDS. And for the very reason that we have had money enough to keep it up.

Mr. THURMAN. For the very reason that we have fulfilled our faith, and we intend to do it, and everybody knows it. Nobody doubts it, nobody fears it; and there is no necessity in the world for levying these taxes for any such purpose.

These, Mr. President, are my views. I say that you begin at the wrong end. Instead of increasing taxation, you ought to cut down expenditures. Somebody will ask, how are you going to do that? I have heard it asserted here that there was no means of cutting down expenditures. I give but my opinion for whatever it is worth, that you ought to reduce the Army to 15,000 men, and that would save you $10,000,000 a year. I do not believe there is the slightest necessity for a man more than 15,000 in the Army. We used to have an Army of 9,000, and I believe an Army of 9,000 now could perform all the service really that is necessary to be performed in this country, but I am sure that an army of 15,000 could. That would save you $10,000,000 a year. I believe that one-half of the expenses of the Navy might well be spared, and that would save you $20,000,000 or $15,000,000 more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How would the Senator reduce that? In what respects?

Mr. THURMAN. I would reduce it by dispensing with the expenditures we have for the Navy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which ones? What expenses would you reduce?

Mr. THURMAN. All of them; I would cut them down; I would not have so many ships built; I would not have so many officers in the service nor half so many seamen in the service; I would not maintain such expensive fleets.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many seamen have we now?

Mr. THURMAN. Well, I am not going into a general catechism with the Senator about that. The Senator knows as well as I do. It is very easy to say you cannot cut them down. You can cut them down; and it would be economical this day for this Government to burn up one-half its ships; it would save money by doing it rather than by maintaining them in commission at the expense that the Navy has been to us.

Mr. President, you have begun at the wrong end. Cut down your expenses and you will have no necessity for increasing the taxes of the people; and this Government cannot get out of this trouble, nor can the people of the country get out of their business troubles until the most rigid economy is practiced, not simply by the people, but by every government in the country, Federal, State, and municipal. There must be the strictest economy in government, and there must be the strictest economy in the household, and with the individual; and then, sir, we may soon hope to have our indebtedness under such control that business may once more revive and the country again run its career of prosperity.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3511) regulating the removal of causes from State courts to the circuit courts of the United States, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LUKE P. POLAND of Vermont, Mr. LYMAN TREMAIN of New York, and Mr. C. A. ELDREDGE of Wisconsin, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and agreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill, with amendments; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM LOUGHRIDGE of Iowa, Mr. ISAAC C. PARKER of Missouri, and Mr. JOHN HANCOCK of Texas, managers at the same on its part.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 3818, an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference report that the said committee have been unable to agree.

AARON A. SARGENT,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
HENRY COOPER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ISAAC C. PARKER,
G. L. FORT,
S. J. RANDALL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate still further insist and ask for another conference with the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT being authorized by unanimous consent to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. DAVIS were appointed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DORSEY, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. RAMSEY submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was Ordered, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. DAVIS was subsequently, on his own motion, excused from serving on the conference committee on the Indian appropriation bill, and Mr. STEVENSON was appointed to fill the vacancy on the committee.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3511) regulating the removal of causes from State courts to the circuit courts of the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. CARPENTER, Mr. CONKLING, and Mr. THURMAN.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the resolution to print R. W. Raymond's report on mining statistics.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution instructing the engrossing clerk to correct a clerical error in the report of the conference committee on the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army, by transferring the first amendment proposed to section two, from after the words "wounds received in action," in the fourteenth line, so that it will come after the words "wounds received in battle," in the eighteenth line.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeig votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. A. WHEELER of New York, Mr. JOHN COBURN of Indiana, and Mr. A. M. WADDELL of North Carolina, managers at the same on its part.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. STEVENSON.

GENERAL SAMUEL W. CRAWFORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the engrossing clerk be instructed to correct a clerical error in the report of the conference committee on the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army, by transferring the first amendment proposed to section 2 from after the words "wounds received in action," in the fourteenth line, so that it will come after the words "wounds received in battle" in the eighteenth line.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope that resolution will be passed. It is a correction of an error that occurred in drawing up the report.

The resolution was concurred in.

TARIFF AND TAX BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund, and provide for the exigencies of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, it is expected that this bill will produce in round numbers about $35,000,000. Admitting that, under existing revenue laws and at the present rate of expenditure money enough will not be raised for the current expenses of the Government. The question comes up whether Congress should increase taxation or reduce expenses; and as one mode of determining this problem it will be well to look into the condition of the country and of its great interests—commercial, financial, agricultural, and manufacturing. Let us see how much taxation the people are new enduring and how able they are to sustain it.

It must be recollected, in considering this particular point, that the people of the United States have two governments to support—the General Government and the State governments, and to ascertain what they pay we must add together the sums raised for each purpose. The statistics of State taxation for the past year are not at hand, and therefore I take the year 1870, the census giving the necessary information.

The population of the United States in 1870 was 38,555,983, and the Army was 30,000, costing $57,655,695.40, or about $1,700 to each soldier. The net ordinary receipts were $395,959,833.87. Then the following table will show United States and State receipts for governmental purposes for 1870:

United States	$395,959,833 87
Alabama	1,456,024 00
Arkansas	950,894 00
California	2,540,383 00

Total of taxation for governments	644,163,707 87

The idea prevails that this new and free Republic is taxed less than European nations, with their great civil establishments, their enormous national debts, and their immense standing armies.

Austria, with a population according to the last census of 35,904,435 and a standing army on a peace footing of 245,090, only expends annually for the support of her government $261,098,000. If each soldier cost as much there as here, the support of the army alone would be about $380,000,000 each year.

The population of France, now that she has lost Alsace and Lorraine, is 36,102,821. Her standing army in time of peace is 425,000; her annual expenditure, $444,120,000, embraced in which is part of the Prussian war indemnity.

The population of Great Britain is 31,817,108; her army, 133,649; her annual expenditure is $345,140,000. She has an immense navy, and a national debt of nearly $4,000,000,000.

Germany has a population of 41,058,139, with a peace army of 402,500 and an annual expenditure of $383,120,000.

So that the people of the United States pay in taxation each year for the support of their various governments nearly three times as much as the Austrians, one-third more than the French, nearly twice as much as the British and German people. We pay about $17 for each person in the country, no matter of what age, sex, or color.

This does not make a very favorable exhibit for the imposition of additional taxes.

Now let me give some statistics of the greatest interest in the country—the agricultural—and show how prostrate that is and how ill able to bear further burdens.

We have been accustomed to boast that the great Mississippi Valley, embracing its tributaries, was the granary of the world, and certainly it did contribute a vast sum to the re venues and resources of the country by its exports of grain. But a new competitor for the markets of the world has arisen, and Russia not only is supplanting us in Europe, but is even threatening to undersell the West in the Atlantic cities. That wise and far-seeing government has been silently and energetically building railroads to connect her rich grain-growing territory with the ocean, with what result I shall presently show. She can raise wheat cheaper than we do because her laborers dress in sheepskins and are content with about $20 a year wages. She can build and run railroads cheaper for the same reason. She can land wheat at Liverpool cheaper than we can take it from Chicago to New York, and the laborer who raises it in the West gets nearly as much a month as the Russian does a year. It is commonly estimated that a man in the West who raises three hundred bushels of wheat to sell must expend two hundred of them to get the other hundred to market. And we have seen the farmers of that region burning corn for fuel while people were starving in the Eastern States. And it is this dreadful condition of things that has caused the birth and growth of the powerful and numerous orders of the Grange.

But to show how we are declining and Russia advancing in the production and exportation of wheat, let me give the figures.

From 1860 to 1864 inclusive the following were the exports of wheat of the two countries into Great Britain:

United States, bushels	127,047,126
Russia, bushels	47,376,809
Balance in favor of United States	79,670,317

From 1868 to 1872 inclusive:

Russia, bushels	117,967,022
United States, bushels	116,462,380
Balance in favor of Russia	1,504,642

Nor are we better off in respect to cotton. The English government has been bending all its energies to the production of cotton in India, and is succeeding as the following statistics show:

Receipts of cotton in Great Britain in 1860 compared with 1872.

1860.		1872.
From—	Cotton.	From—	Cotton.
	Pounds.		Pounds.
United States	1,115,890,608	All other countries	783,237,392
All other countries	275,048,144	United States	625,600,080
In favor of United States.	840,842,464	Against United States	187,637,312

The State of Louisiana affords a striking illustration of the depressed—I might say ruined—condition of the agriculture of the country. Let me compare 1860 with 1870.

In 1860 she produced as follows, namely:

Wheat, bushels	32,208
Rye, bushels	36,665
Corn, bushels	16,853,745
Oats, bushels	89,377
Cotton, bales	777,738
Wool, pounds	290,847
Sugar, hogsheads	221,726
Molasses, gallons	13,430,772

In 1870 she produced as follows, namely:

Wheat, bushels	9,906
Rye, bushels	984
Corn, bushels	7,596,628
Oats, bushels	17,782
Cotton, bales	350,832
Wool, pounds	140,428
Sugar, hogsheads	80,706
Molasses, gallons	4,585,150

How are the people of that State to survive a fresh burden of taxation?

So much for our agriculture. How is it with our shipping, upon which we once so much prided ourselves? Here is a statement of its condition, taken from official sources, exhibiting what has been well characterized a ruinous decline:

Years.	American tonnage.	Foreign tonnage.	Excess of American tonnage.	Excess of foreign tonnage.
1830	967,227	131,900	835,327
1840	1,576,946	712,363	864,583
1850	2,573,016	1,775,623	797,393
1860	5,921,285	2,353,911	3,567,374
1861	5,023,917	2,217,554	2,806,363
1864	3,066,434	3,471,219		404,785
1866	3,372,060	4,410,424		1,038,364
1868	3,550,550	4,495,465		944,915
1869	3,402,668	5,347,694		1,945,026
1870	3,486,038	5,669,621		2,183,583
1871	3,742,740	6,266,444		2,523,704
1872	3,711,846	7,094,577		3,382,731
1873	3,612,631	8,033,087		4,470,456

We thus see that from 1861 to the beginning of 1874, a period of only thirteen years, there is a change against American shipping of 7,277,819 tons. Forty-five years ago our commercial marine for our own trade was four times that of all other nations. Now, of all the vessels entering our ports we have only about 3,500,000 tonnage, while other nations have more than 8,000,000; and these latter do the great bulk of the rapid and most profitable business and nearly all the passenger trade. Their profits are, therefore, even far greater than would appear from the simple comparison of tonnage.

But there are more facts of value for study and reflection. In 1860 the total American tonnage which entered British ports was 1,747,651 tons, the total British tonnage entering our ports being 1,136,364 tons. But in 1870 the American tonnage entering the British ports was only 479,670 tons, while vessels flying the British colors entering our ports during that year measured 2,778,823 tons. Herein we have greatly retrograded; England has greatly advanced. Of the whole tonnage entering American ports from the West Indies in 1861, 86 per cent. belonged to the United States, and only 12 per cent. in 1870. For the same years respectively our carrying trade to the German states—Denmark, Holland, and Belgium—decreased from 21 to 7 per cent. of the whole; with France it decreased from 89 to 22 per cent.; with England from 71 to 19 per cent.; with the whole our average of 71 per cent. in 1860 had dwindled down to 15 per cent. in 1870. And by reason of the superiority of foreign vessels in speed we are still worse off in respect of profits than the figures show us to be in respect to tonnage.

The great iron interest is in the same unhappy condition of decay. The consumption of pig-iron in the United States in 1873 was estimated at 3,023,058 tons, of which 2,868,278 tons were home make. In 1874 the estimated home product was only 1,900,000 tons. Furnaces have stopped; thousands of workmen are out of employment and their families suffering; riot and bloodshed are common in the iron districts, and the police and militia have been called in to preserve order and to protect life and property.

One thing in the affairs of the country has given alarm to all thoughtful men, and that is the vast debt we owe to Europe. This debt exists in every form. The Government bonds are held largely abroad; so are the bonds of the States, of railroads, of cities, and of corporations. Large sums go across the Atlantic annually to pay the interest on this debt, which is estimated by men well informed to be from $1,000,000,000 to $1,500,000,000. Up to the last year the drain created in this way upon our resources has been compensated by the immigration to this country, which for five years beginning with 1869 was as follows:

1869	395,922
1870	378,796
1871	367,789
1872	449,483
1873	422,545

These immigrants brought money with them. In 1856 the commissioners of immigration questioned each immigrant, and came to the conclusion that the average of money brought by them was $68.08. But this estimate was afterward ascertained to be much too small. The immigrants, not knowing the object of the question put them and not caring to disclose their means anyhow, did not give correct answers and nearly always understated their means. In one case a farmer and three sons declared they had only $25 each. When the matter was explained to them the old man admitted he had $2,700 and each of the sons about the same, making in all $11,000, instead of $100, as at first reported. The report of the commissioners of immigration for 1854 states that the German immigrants had alone for each of the three previous years brought an annual average of $11,000,000. Statistical tables of the Grand Duchy of Baden fix the amount that each immigrant brought at $98 in gold; that of the Bavarians at $93.20; that of the Brunswickers at $96. The Wurtembergers who came in 1856 brought $134 gold each; in 1857, $145; and in 1858 each came with $318. But it was not only in bringing money to the country that the immigrant was valuable. He very soon became a producer and a tax-payer, and in that way added to the good condition of the country. But this immigration has now fallen off greatly, and many are returning and taking away with them their earnings; and when the decreased immigration and the increased emigration are considered, it is doubtful whether we are making or losing. The statistics of immigration for 1874 have not been published, and therefore I cannot speak with entire accuracy. But the receipts from passengers, especially in the steerage, of the various lines of steamers plying across the Atlantic tell plainly the story of the decline both of immigration and of business.

Here are their exhibits of receipts from freight and passengers for the years 1873 and 1874:

In one year there was a decline of $27,426,770 in the receipts of these lines from freights and steerage passengers. Then it is seen, that the influx of immigrants with their money and labor, which has heretofore brought back to us the sums sent abroad to pay our debts, has nearly ceased. The outward flow goes on and will continue to increase; the inward flow is ceasing. This must tell heavily against us; it will have the same effect upon this country that absenteeism has had upon Ireland. There the large estates were owned principally by men who lived either in England or on the Continent. The rents were collected by bailiffs or agents, and at once sent away. The revenues of Ireland were not spent there, but elsewhere. The result was inevitable. Ireland was impoverished, and nearly half her population has abandoned her. So the payment away of so much annually must affect the United States very injuriously. We are younger and larger and richer than Ireland, it is true; but still that does not alter the principle.

This extract from a newspaper shows in vivid yet true colors the present condition of affairs:

HOW THE HARD TIMES AFFECT THINGS IN NEW YORK.

First, building is stopped, and men by the hundreds are thrown out of work. Rents are down, and landlords have to wait where rents remain or take the stores and warehouses on their own hands. Every third store on Broadway seems to be to let, with chambers and lots innumerable. Men who had fair employment last May and took a tenement to live in, having lost their place, have to give up. Society is so interlocked that what hurts one department hurts all. The hotels are losing money, and seem like banqueting halls deserted. Grocers groan over the lack of trade. Men who bought by the pound buy by the quarter; men who bought by the chest buy by the pound. Butchers say that their trade has decreased one-half; men live on vegetables. The barbers complain; men shave themselves. The car receipts are reduced; men walk instead of riding. They have nothing to do, and five cents is worth saving. The churches feel this state of things terribly. In one church that I happen to know over a third of the pew rents have been lost and the penny collections have been reduced one-half. In the most important Baptist church in this city $1,000 was taken from the minister's salary and in a miff he resigned. A general reduction of salaries is threatened all along the line. Last year, in Brooklyn, a very costly Presbyterian church was built through the influence of one man. He was worth a quarter of a million and promised to "see the thing through." He went to smash, and the minister, disheartened, has left. Our mission work feels the pressure beyond example. The sufferers have increased a hundred-fold and the supply is cut off full 50 per cent. The same is true of all the benevolent operations. The Dutch church have announced that their receipts the last month for missions were the smallest ever known since the organization. Men are begging who never begged before. There is absolutely nothing to be done, and no pay if people could get work. To say that there is actual want and starvation in the city is to speak within bounds.

The panic has even affected the barbers; men are now so poor they either shave themselves or do not shave at all. To this dreadful extremity the republican party has brought the country; and now, finding, as they say, the income of the Government not equal to its expenditure, and being called upon to decide between additional taxation and retrenchment, they take the former. And they take the former, when it seems to me it would be so easy to reduce the expenses to its income under present laws, and so proper to do so. How can it be done?

We have the authority of the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SHERMAN] for the statement that in the appropriation bills—some of which have passed, some are in committees of conference, and some yet to be acted on—there are $26,000,000 appropriated for public works. Surely all these are not necessary at this time. While it may be a matter of convenience to build a court-house, a post-office, or a custom-house, it is not indispensable, and the country can get along for a while longer without them. If they have not been commenced, let us do with the buildings now occupied till times are better. If they have been begun, it will not hurt them to suspend work for a year or two. By doing this we can save several millions of dollars at once.

The Army of the United States now consists of 25,000 men. The country can do with 15,000. We are safe from foreign invasion. If all the fleets of the world could be collected in one harbor, and then have a safe passage across the Atlantic, they could not transport troops enough, with their necessary equipments, to make any serious attack upon us. We are protected from invasion by the broad oceans lying on either side of us. The reduction of the Army to 15,000 would make an annual saving of $12,000,000 or $15,000,000. And unless the Army be better employed than it has lately it had better be abolished; for the President of the United States put the Army under the unlimited control of a so-called governor of a State, who employed it in the unconstitutional act of ejecting five members of the Legislature of that State. The President, in a message subsequently sent in to the Senate, declared that there was no doubt of the fact that these men were not entitled to their seats. But a committee of the House, composed of a majority of republicans, after visiting Louisiana and examining the facts, reported that the ejected members were entitled to their seats, and a republican House confirmed the report. And I repeat that an Army used for such purposes in a republic had better be disbanded and the men returned to the duties of private citizenship.

Another source of saving might be found in our Indian affairs. I have looked into the details of these with some astonishment, and I am sure the public generally have not the least conception of their actual condition. Referring to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, I find that the whole number of Indians (exclusive of those in Alaska) in the United States is 275,003. This embraces men, women, and papooses. The report gives the interesting and important intelligence that 43,953 Indians wear citizens' dress. It also lets it be known that during the year the number of Indians killed was 391, of whom 122 were killed by United States soldiers. The Indians have reserves embracing 145,733,260 acres of land, of which they cultivated 317,213, the number engaged in agriculture being 43,963. The Indians raised the following crops:

Wheat, bushels	269,215
Corn, bushels	1,720,765
Oats, bushels	171,565
Potatoes, bushels	346.919
Turnips, bushels	16,287
Onions, bushels	2,519
Beans, bushels	14,620
Hay, tons	160,082

Their farm products would seem to compare not unfavorably with the whites, considering the area cultivated and the numbers engaged in work.

The Indians own stock as follows, namely:

Horses	336,936
Mules	1,593
Cattle	329,602
Hogs	443,963
Sheep	144,408

The number of feet of lumber sawed was 8,702,975, and the value of furs sold was $815,618. To these things must be added the food supplied by the buffalo and other game and the abundant fish of some of the streams.

Does it not seem from this exhibit that the Indians ought to be able to get along without any great assistance from the Government? Yet the people will be surprised to learn the annual cost to them of the Indians.

The United States holds a trust fund for the benefit of the Indians amounting to the great sum of $11,827,892.99½, upon which an interest accrues annually, and is annually paid and expended, of $633,728.09. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, the Government expended on the Indians the large amount of $6,692,462.09.

Thus we see that the number of Indians is less than 300,000; that they have more than 145,000,000 acres of land; that a large number of them are engaged in agriculture; that they have a good supply of stock; that they raise very considerable quantities of farm products; that they have the resources of hunting, fishing, and trapping; that they have a trust fund of more than $11,000,000. And yet in addition to all this the Government expends upon them nearly $7,000,000 a year. There must be great room for curtailment in all this. It is not credible that so much money can, under the circumstances, be actually needed and fairly expended for the use of the Indians. Much the largest part of it must find its way into the pockets of agents and speculators.

This is the cost of feeding and supporting the Indians, and does not embrace the expense of fighting them. The United States troops, as stated above, killed one hundred and twenty-two of them during the past year, each one of whom is estimated to have cost several thousand dollars.

Add to the feeding the Indians the cost of fighting them, and a very pretty little sum of several million is the "demnition total."

The bill is nominally "for the further protection of the sinking fund," and for other purposes. But the contract of the Government when the debt was created and the sinking fund established was to pay 1 per cent. annually, so as to extinguish the whole debt within a certain number of years. If that had been observed exactly, the sum paid by this time would have been in round numbers $400,000,000. But we have in fact paid about $600,000,000, or one-third more than we contracted to do, and cannot be charged therefore with any dereliction on that account. But we have the authority of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Finance, for saying that the sanctity of the sinking fund has been long since violated. In the debate on this bill he said:

Why, sir, does not every man know that for two years and a half this sinking fund has been taken for your current appropriations? For two years it has been deficient more than it is now. Is my honorable friend from Maine now to learn, that two years ago, when these accumulated appropriation bills had exhausted the Treasury, the sinking fund had been eaten out? During the year ending the 30th of June, 1874, $25,000,000 of the sinking fund had been absorbed, I think without law, to make good the appropriation bills passed by Congress. Why, then, was there not an appeal to the honor of the country? Why was not public attention called to it? Why, then, were not taxes demanded?

These are pertinent questions and hard to answer. Nor is it easy to see why the republican party in this time of unexampled depression proposes to add $35,000,000 to the taxes of the country in order to "protect the sinking fund."

So much for the general features of the bill, and now let me examine briefly its details, which are to the last degree unjust.

It proposes an increase of the tax on whisky and on tobacco and a partial restoration of the duties taken off by the act of June, 1872. Common justice requires that all these things should be put upon an equal footing; but our republican friends have got so much in the habit of legislating against the South, that they cannot pass even a tax bill without discriminating against that unhappy region. Tobacco is mainly a southern product, therefore harder terms must be imposed upon tobacco than upon other articles.

The first section of the bill declares in express terms that the increased tax should be imposed on whisky made after the passage of the law. And the fifth section declares:

That the increase of duties provided by this act shall not apply to any goods, wares, or merchandise actually on shipboard and bound to the United States on or before the 10th day of February, 1875, nor on any such goods, wares, or merchandise on deposit in warehouses or public stores at the date of the passage of this act.

Thus putting goods upon the footing of whisky.

But the case with tobacco is far different. The increased tax not only applies to tobacco hereafter to be manufactured, but to that already manufactured and on hand. I have endeavored to remedy this inequality by the amendment I offered, declaring that the increased tax shall only apply to tobacco hereafter manufactured.

But this is not the only objectionable part of the bill. The second proviso attempts to abrogate contracts made between citizens and make new contracts for them. It provides that when tobacco has been sold, the purchaser shall pay the increased tax of 4 cents on the pound imposed by this bill. That is, he has bought the tobacco fairly at one price, but the Government says he shall pay a greater. This provision is not only scandalous, but it is incapable of enforcement, and will lead to great litigation. How is the Government to compel the purchaser to pay the additional 4 cents a pound? If the officials refuse to let him remove the tobacco, then he can claim that the contract is abrogated, and he is not bound to comply. But suppose he has bought the tobacco, say at 50 cents the pound, and has actually paid for it, and is denied the right to remove it till he pays the increased tax of 4 cents. In that case he is reduced to the alternative of losing his tobacco or of giving 54 cents a pound for what he only contracted to give 50.

When by the act of June, 1872, the tax on tobacco was made uniform at 20 cents the pound, it was regarded as a finality and as a compromise between opposing interests and the Government. It was intended and expected that the tax should remain at 20 cents, and only be changed to reduce it. It has worked admirably; has been easily collected; has yielded an increased revenue, and the country had settled down and adapted itself to it. Now all this is to be unnecessarily disturbed to "protect the sinking fund," the chastity of which had been already violated.

I insist, therefore, that the bill as a whole is unnecessary and oppressive and in its details is unjust, and discriminates against the poorest section of the country.

The executive, which is the treaty-making power, might do much to relieve the people from their present troubles, and find them a market for their products—especially of the West. It should be our effort to have advantageous treaties with those countries that wanted our products and whose products we wanted. The West have wheat, hemp, corn, pork, horses, mules, and cannot find a market for them. If there is any country that needs these things and has what we want, then it would seem only wise that we should so arrange it that we could exchange commodities. Now, there are two countries, lying close at hand, and both approachable by water from the very center of western production, that want exactly these very things and have what we want—I mean Cuba and Mexico. Vessels could be loaded on the Mississippi and its great tributaries—the Missouri, the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Arkansas, the Red River—and floated directly to a Cuban or Mexican port. But there is no reciprocity in the trade with those countries. Coffee, which we import largely from Cuba, is admitted free to the United States. But if we wanted to take our products there we could not do it, because the tax in Cuba on a bushel of corn brought from the United States is 40 cents, on an American horse $55, on a mule $19, on a barrel of flour $8, on lard 3½ cents per pound. These duties are prohibitory, and effectually shut out the products of the West from the Cuban markets. Nobody can afford to take horses there when he has to pay a duty of $55, nor corn when the duty is 40 cents a bushel.

The Mexican rate of duties is still more excessive. There should be an immense demand for our western products there; but the aggregate tax upon American commodities is about 96 per cent. Mexico has a population of about 10,000,000, and is an adjacent country. Yet of all the commerce with that country the United States has only about 10 per cent.

If, therefore, our treaty-making power should endeavor to bring about a change in these respects, and should open up the trade of these two countries for us, the West would no longer have to transport her products across the continent to the Atlantic Ocean, then across the ocean to a precarious and uncertain market in Europe, where the competition of Russia is so great and strong. Cuba and Mexico are the countries of gold and silver. These we could get in addition to the other products of those countries, and thus be more able to pay our European indebtedness.

Thus, Mr. President, by a wise economy we could avoid more taxation, and by skillful diplomacy we might open up a near market for the products of our great West.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I will say a word or two in regard to this bill, and in the first place a word as to the sinking fund. The act of 1862 which authorized the issue of 5.20 bonds contains a provision devoting the customs receipts to the following purposes:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States—

Not the $500,000,000 loan provided for in this act, but "the entire debt of the United States"— to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

One per cent. of the receipts from customs to be set apart for the payment of the entire debt; a prospective provision looking forward to the accumulation of a public debt in the prosecution of the war not to be limited to this act. It has never been so understood. I never heard that idea advanced before to-day. It has always been recognized as a sinking fund applicable to the whole debt of the United States, and several enactments subsequent to this time certainly recognized that fact.

The act of 1864 spoke of the sinking fund as an obligation. The act of 1870 made an appropriation annually for that purpose. So that I think it may be accepted as an established proposition, first, that the sinking fund was to be applied to the whole debt and not to the first $500,000,000; second, that 1 per cent. was to be applied annually without regard to any extra amount that might be paid upon the debt in one year. It was to be a gradual extinction of the public debt. That assurance was given to our creditors. We borrowed money upon the faith of it, that we would set apart so much every year toward the payment of that debt. It was a part of our credit.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] says that is not a contract. It is in equity a contract, but whether it is properly a contract or not, it is a public pledge given by the Government in advance to every man who would lend money to the Government that enough of the receipts from customs to amount to 1 per cent. of the entire debt shall be set apart every year to the payment of that debt.

Mr. President, this sinking fund differs from that created by the government of England in this: It will be remembered that after the Napoleonic wars Mr. Pitt brought forward the scheme of a sinking fund which would pay the debt of England; I forget now in how many years, but at a period which would have already transpired. The bill passed. The fund was created. It was kept up for some years. Then it dropped behind in bad times; I believe the first year about a million of pounds sterling, the next year two or three millions. It finally got behind ten or fifteen millions, and then it was abandoned. If that sinking fund had been kept up according to the original plan the public debt of England would have been paid before this time; but it first got behind a little, then a little more, until the deficiency became so great that they could not pay it up very well, and it was given up. So it will be with our sinking fund. It will be behind on the 1st of July next, according to the present estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, $35,000,000. If we make no provision for it, a year from this time it will be behind $50,000,000, and then the deficiency will be so great that it cannot be made up, and it will be given up; and this will be the first blow struck at the validity of our national debt.

I understand the Secretary to say that he feels it to be a duty resting upon him, imposed upon him by the most positive provisions of the law, to take from the customs receipts enough money to make this sinking fund good, and that without regard to the deficiency in the revenue for current expenses. I presume I shall violate no confidence if I state that I heard him say to-day upon this floor that he feels it to be his duty to take enough of the money in the Treasury now to make this sinking fund good, without regard to what may be the current expenses of the Government. Undoubtedly, the law makes that his duty. It says it shall be set aside, and he has no discretion in the matter. Suppose he does that. Then on the 1st of July next there will be a deficiency of $35,000,000 in the current expenses of this Government.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] admits that the sinking fund must be kept up. He admits its sanctity. He says the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to take enough of the customs receipts to make the sinking fund good from year to year, and that he has got no discretion about it—I so understood him—but he says that we can get along by failing to build public works, by stopping the work on custom-houses and post-offices in the different States, and the river and harbor improvements; that in that way we can save enough money to replace that which was taken out of the customs receipts for the purpose of making the sinking fund good. Now, I beg Senators on this floor to consider that proposition very briefly. There is nothing more demoralizing in the public mind than the suspension of public works from a cause like that. If you see a custom-house or a post-office in Chicago, or Cincinnati, or Saint Louis standing still, the walls covered up, the work all suspended, there is visible evidence of the bankruptcy of the Government or of the incompetency of an administration. No more demoralizing spectacle could be presented than to have men turned out of employment, work suspended in your navy-yards, upon your harbor improvements, upon river improvements, the snags not taken out of the rivers, the sand-bars accumulating, navigation obstructed, when men who expected employment and have had it heretofore are idle—I say that no more demoralizing result than that can be brought about. I would rather see the Government borrow money to carry these things on than to do that.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the Senator a question. I do not want to discuss this bill; I do not intend to discuss it; but I see that the points which have struck me are left without any discussion. My question is as to the sinking fund. I should like to provide for the sinking fund myself, and at the same time I would like to have a bill that would not cripple my constituents in some other way. I find in this bill a proposition to tax whisky 90 cents, and not to levy that tax on whisky in hand but on such as shall be produced hereafter. I turn right over to another section, and I find that tobacco on hand is not excepted from the tax.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes; it is.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon; tobacco on hand is not excepted, and I should like to have it explained. In reference to whisky it says:

That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied and collected, on all distilled spirits thereafter produced in the United States, a tax of 90 cents, &c.

In reference to tobacco, I find this proviso on the second page, line 10:

Provided, That the increase of tax herein provided for shall not apply to tobacco on which the tax under existing laws shall have been paid when this act takes effect.

I should like to have some Senator reconcile these provisions and show why it is that tobacco on hand is taxed and whisky on hand is not taxed. Inasmuch as my constituents produce both, I should like to know something about that before I am asked to vote on the question of the sinking fund.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I have offered an amendment covering that very point, and that it is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The fact of the tax being paid is evidenced by a stamp that is placed upon the tobacco. Any one who has tobacco already produced can easily procure the stamps and place them upon it, and if the tobacco men are as sharp as the whisky men have been, they have already done it. I have no doubt that all the tobacco in the country that is ready for a stamp has already been stamped.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, that is the point; but, if the Senator will allow me, suppose the whisky is stamped too?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then the duty has been paid.

Mr. LOGAN. What duty? Not this new duty?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The old duty; and it is the same with the tobacco.

Mr. LOGAN. But suppose the whisky is not stamped, then how is it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then it will be subject to the new duty.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg your pardon. The bill says:

That from and after passage of this act there shall be levied on all distilled spirits thereafter produced, &c.

But with tobacco it is different.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We know, for instance, that there were eleven million gallons of spirits that were on hand in warehouse on the 1st of January, and that since that more than one-half of the duties have been paid and it has been taken out of warehouse.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; but that does not mend the matter a particle. Now at Chicago, Quincy, Peoria, and other places in my State they produce whisky largely. In the southern part of the State they produce tobacco largely. The whisky that is on hand now is exempt from this increased tax of twenty cents; but the tobacco on hand now is subject to it according to the bill itself. Now I do not see how I can consistently tell the people in the southern part of my State that their product on hand is to be taxed, while the product of the people in the northern part of the State on hand is not to be taxed. That is what I mean. For instance, you have a large quantity of tobacco. Many persons will purchase it in the hogshead. That tobacco is on hand, and it is not stamped possibly; that tobacco has already been produced, but the very moment you put it in boxes then you put this additional tax on it although the tobacco has been produced; but whisky is exempt. That is this bill precisely, and no man can give it any other construction. If he can, he understands the rule of construction better than I do. I thought it was different, and I understood the bill differently until I read it carefully three or four times. A gentleman from the House came to me to try to explain it to me, but when he found he could not explain it he went back again. He told me that the bill was that all tobacco and whisky already produced should be exempt; but when I come to read the bill I find it is not so.

Mr. MORTON. When is the tax on the whisky to be paid?

Mr. LOGAN. The tax on whisky in hand, now produced, in barrels or kegs, under this bill, is to be taxed the old amount.

Mr. MORTON. The question I ask is, when is that tax to be paid; when the whisky goes into the warehouse?

Mr. LOGAN. When it goes out it is stamped.

Mr. MORTON. Out of the distillery?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. It has to go out of the distillery stamped?

Mr. LOGAN. Whether it is stamped or not, all whisky on hand is exempt. That is the language of the bill. But all the tobacco on hand has to pay the tax. That is a distinction and a discrimination that I think it will be pretty hard to explain.

Mr. MORTON. I have a few more remarks to make. There is one distinction between our sinking fund and that created by the English government to which I referred. That sinking fund was established after the debt was created. It was not a part of the contract It was not a pledge upon which the money was borrowed. In our case it is different. The sinking fund was created before the first 5.20 bonds were sold, and every dollar of debt created since that time has been upon the distinct pledge by the Government that 1 per cent. of the receipts from customs should be set apart every year for the payment of the debt. I may remark here that I understand that for the last twenty-five years no Government loan to any amount has been effected in the cities of Europe, in London or in Germany, that has not been accompanied by a provision for a sinking fund. Some three or four years ago Russia made a loan in London. The first attempt was without a sinking fund. The bonds were not taken, and although they were eighty-year bonds, they had to be withdrawn from the market until a sinking fund was provided by the Russian government and the pledge of that accompanied the bonds in the market. I imagine now that no European government could effect a loan upon any favorable terms in the money markets of England or Germany unless accompanied by provisions for a sinking fund.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said that this tax of 90 cents on whisky could not be collected. I do not agree with him about that. I think that a tax of 90 cents can be collected very nearly or quite as well as a tax of 70 cents. You cannot reason on that subject from the condition of things when the tax was $2. At that time the machinery of collection was much more imperfect than it is now. It has been greatly perfected since that time, as we all know. If this tax is reasonably well collected at 70 cents, it can be at 90 cents. I understand that the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau is satisfied that such a tax as this can be collected.

But the Senator from Ohio says that this increase of 20 cents is a bounty for the owners of whisky in store. Now, can you lay a tax upon any personal property in the character of merchandise that does not operate in the same way? Could the Senator from Ohio conceive of a case that would not have that result? He is in favor of taxing tea and coffee. Suppose you put a tax on tea and coffee, will it not have the same effect precisely? Those who have large stocks on hand do not pay that tax. It is paid upon that which is imported after the passage of the law, and those who have large stocks on hand get the benefit of the increased price without paying any tax.

Mr. LOGAN. Why not let the man who has tobacco on hand get the increased price as well as the man who has whisky on hand?

Mr. MORTON. I have not paid particular attention to that point.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg your pardon.

Mr. MORTON. I am speaking now about the argument that this will be a bounty to the men who have whisky on hand. In every change of taxation somebody makes money. That cannot be prevented. If you put an increased tax on tea and coffee, that is the result to those who have stocks on hand. I think the statement was made by a member of the other House very recently, on the discussion of this bill—if it is in order to refer to it—that there was a stock of coffee on hand large enough to last twelve months. I think that is a mistake; but undoubtedly, since the President's message came into Congress recommending a tax on tea and coffee, there have been very large importations made or orders sent for both, and it has been bought up as far as possible, so that if you put the tax on them it is a bounty to those who have stocks on hand. If you were to put a tax on petroleum heretofore produced, it would be the same thing; so that whatever articles you put the tax upon it would be an advantage to those who have the articles on hand at the time. That is a necessity of the case that cannot be avoided, so far as I can see. If there is any way of getting around it it has not been pointed out to me.

Now, Mr. President, we have the question presented here to-day by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] of taxing whisky and tobacco and sugar on the one hand, or tea and coffee on the other. I undertake to say that the imposition of a tax on tea and coffee would be more odious to the people of this country than any other tax that you could levy. They may be wrong about it, they may not be wise; but I believe it would be the most unpopular tax that could be levied. When you propose to put a tax upon tea and coffee, instead of raising the tax on whisky 20 cents and on tobacco 4 cents, you will find the popular judgment, I think, almost entirely on one side. When you tax tea and coffee you tax what every poor family in this country uses, the temperate as well as the intemperate, the poor as well as the rich; and whether it increases the price to them or not they think it does. The vote in the House was very significant of what the popular mind is on the proposition to tax tea and coffee. In the House it received but thirty-three votes out of nearly three hundred members. So far as the country is concerned, as to what will satisfy the country, there is no comparison between the proposition to increase the tax on whisky 20 cents and on tobacco 4 cents, and the proposition to tax tea and coffee. I find by reference to McPherson's Hand-Book that the proposition to make tea and coffee free was adopted without a division in this body in Committee of the Whole three years ago. The tax was repealed by common consent of all parties. The tax upon tobacco, increasing it 4 cents on the pound, would be far preferable to the great mass of the people to a tax upon tea and coffee.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said that the question of taxing whisky was simply a question of collecting the tax; that it was not a question in any other particular. I believe the tax can be collected. He did not argue that by taxing whisky it would diminish the price of corn; that the farmer would suffer by a diminution in the price of corn. He did not argue that by putting an increased price on tobacco you would diminish the price which the producer of tobacco receives for the raw article. I think it would not have that effect. But the Senator from Ohio went on to make this argument: He said there was so much whisky in store that the price of that would be increased and there would be no new whisky manufactured until that which was in store was exhausted, and therefore for some months the Government would get no revenue. I think that is entirely fallacious. I think that when you increase the tax on whisky the price will go up at once and the manufacture will go on just as it has done before. Whisky is always kept on hand in large amounts and as it goes out new is manufactured. There is a steady, regular demand for it every month, and as that which is in store is consumed new whisky is made and put in store in its place, to be there ready for the market. I do not believe such a tax as this would stop the manufacture of whisky for any length of time. I think the manufacture would go on steadily. It might have been different when the tax went up suddenly from half a dollar to two dollars, on a former occasion.

In regard to the tax on sugar, it stands in the same attitude as a tax on tea and coffee, with this difference: A tax on tea and coffee protects nothing; it does not protect any industry that we have in this country; but a tax on sugar does give protection to a great industry in two States in this Union. It is certainly as legitimate to tax sugar as it is to tax tea and coffee, and in one respect it is more so.

Now, Mr. President, this bill does not suit me. If it could be amended, I should be glad to see it amended; but I understand the situation is such that if the bill is amended, it fails. If that happens there can be no increase of taxation until a year from this time, and then it will be several months after that time before increased revenues would come into the Treasury, and, as the matter is going now, by that time the Government would be fifty or sixty or even seventy million dollars behind. If you do not keep up the sinking fund, but take the money that belongs to the sinking fund and apply it to current expenses, the Secretary violates his duty directly, as he acknowledges, and this Government violates its trust. I want to speak this word of warning: If this sinking fund ever gets $50,000,000 behind, it will be abandoned, the idea of paying our debt in the next twenty, thirty, or forty years will be abandoned, and our debt will become what the debt of England is. We started out with the idea of its gradual extinction. I hope that idea will not be abandoned; that we shall adhere to it, and that we shall determine to pay something upon it it every year, at least 1 per cent. of the principal. There is a deficiency in the revenue. It will continue for some time to come. It is the result of the panic and of the consequences following upon the steps of the panic. Nobody is to blame for it, unless all parties were to blame in repealing the duty on tea and coffee, for that was the work of all parties in both Houses of Congress. It was not a party measure at all. The measure passed this body without even a division upon it. I say there is a deficiency of revenue for which nobody is to blame. It was brought about by circumstances over which we had no control. Shall we meet it, or shall we let this thing drag on? Shall the republican party be found at the close of 1876 in the condition that the democratic party was in 1860, when the current expenses ran ahead of the revenues largely? The credit of the Government was down and money had to be borrowed as late as February, 1861, to meet the current expenses of the Government. I hope that we shall have nerve enough to do our duty and impose those taxes that are necessary to carry on the Government.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill as reported, and I desire briefly to state my reasons for that vote.

I am not insensible to the obligation imposed upon me to provide sufficient revenue for the payment of all just obligations of the Government and to keep the national faith intact. I trust I shall never become recreant to so solemn and imperative a duty. But I shall become an unworthy laggard to my senatorial trust if I did not demand of the dominant party proposing such taxation, first, clearly to point out and exhibit that such proposed increased taxation is absolutely essential to the payment of existing national obligations under an economical administration of the Government and for the protection of the nation's faith.

Now, Mr. President, this alleged deficit suddenly comes upon the country. I have looked back to the debates and especially to the speeches of the leading members in the House of Representatives of the dominant party during the past year, and no hint of existing deficits was there hinted at. I can cite a distinguished gentleman from the State of Massachusetts in the other House who proclaimed to the country but two years ago that the condition of the finances under the republican administration were in a most satisfactory condition; but now we are suddenly informed that there is a large deficit of forty millions; that the obligations and public faith of the Government urgently demand an increased taxation as absolutely essential to uphold and preserve the credit of the United States.

If such necessity for increased taxation be true, I must still insist as a condition precedent to my support of the pending bill that the required revenue should be raised by uniform and equal taxation and not by an unjust, unequal, discriminating tax upon the productive industries of the people whom I in part represent on this floor, to the exclusion of other subjects of taxation which, in my judgment should be required to contribute to the common burden and which are not included in the pending bill.

This pending bill is subject, in my opinion, to both objections stated by me.

I am not satisfied that the public credit demands the passage of this bill. If, therefore, any reduction of appropriations for the next fiscal year can be safely had, or if an economical diminution of the ordinary expenses of the Government can be accomplished and thus dispense with the proposed increased taxation, it becomes the highest duty of the Senate to reject this bill. When we look to the past and realize at what a fearful sacrifice and under what oppressive taxation the obligations of the Government and its public faith at home and abroad have been upheld and preserved with unflinching fidelity, none can doubt both the nation's willingness and the nation's capacity to preserve to the letter and spirit that nation's faith. The people have patiently borne for years both during and since the war, a rate of taxation which has been literally frightful. Internal-revenue taxes alone have been levied, which, had they been hinted at during the debates on the Federal Constitution, would have defeated its adoption.

It must, however, not be forgotten in this connection that prosperity and success almost unparalleled in our past history have blessed the efforts and industry of all classes of our enterprising people. It was under that success that this high rate of taxation was imposed and cheerfully paid. We had at that time flush times. But things have changed. Depression has followed, and our country has been passing through a crucible of financial disorder and of commercial and industrial distress unparalleled in our history. Congress must be mindful of that fact. It must not by unwise or unnecessary legislation increase their burdens. Let us make haste slowly. Business in certain branches of trade and industry begins to revive and to inspire the hope that we have passed through the darkest hours of financial trial, and that the bright beams of our former prosperity are again about to bless and gladden our land. But remember, Senators, that point has not yet been reached. Far from it. That prosperity may greatly depend upon the helping hand which Congress shall afford to all classes of enterprises and industries by abstaining from any unnecessary burdens of largely increased taxation. Is, then, the condition of the country at the present moment such as to bear this increased taxation without danger of renewed financial trouble and disaster? Is it wise, is it just to impose hardship and increased burdens now upon industries that can illy afford to bear it unless an imperious and pressing necessity demands it?

Mr. President, this present alleged deficit of the revenue is in the opinion of some of the wisest and most experienced financiers, composed alike of statesmen of both political parties, more fanciful than real. If this be true, this bill ought to fail. Before increased taxation takes the form of law, let our wasteful and lavish appropriations cease. Let us cut our garments according to the cloth. Let the millions of useless and wasteful expenditures of public money be given up before any increase of taxation upon a suffering and embarrassed people shall receive your sanction.

Many of the appropriations to the amount of millions can wait; many that are contemplated can be suspended without public inconvenience; and that, in my judgment, would be the whole extent of the inconvenience resulting from our failure to pass the pending bill, while its rejection would be a measure of incalculable popular relief by rendering increased taxation unnecessary.

One single bill not yet acted on at the present session of Congress will probably contain $22,000,000 of money for miscellaneous appropriations. Many of them to the amount of millions might be dispensed with for years, many of them forever. The practical question which I then put to the Senate and which I put to the country is, had Congress not better cut off these unnecessary expenditures, wait until more prosperous times for a revival of trade? and then increased taxation will be unnecessary now or hereafter. An abandonment of these appropriations for objects which the country can well afford to wait will be the only inconvenience from our failure to pass this bill, while its rejection would be a measure of incalculable relief to the burdened and oppressed people of this entire land. Such are some of my old-fashioned democratic views. One of the worst symptoms of the times is the popular belief that the Federal Government is to do everything, to embark in every enterprise, and to furnish money to every enterprise, however visionary. Such was not the faith of our fathers. But the unsound, latitudinarian views that now prevail in expending money for everything only the more sternly demand the retrenchment and economy I insist upon and forbid increased taxation.

I beg the Senate to make economy the rallying cry, and united action of both political parties; let there be retrenchment and reduced expenditures in every department of this Government. Why expend three, or four, or five, or six hundred thousand dollars on this Capitol at the present session? Especially as such appropriations contemplate mere decoration. Such vast expenditures add not one iota to the utility of the Capitol. While I am willing to make necessary appropriations, I demand in the name of a suffering, oppressed people that you shall wait for better times before you expend millions upon mere follies? Then thousands upon thousands of dollars, nay, millions, may be dispensed with on your fortifications, as to many of which it is a waste of money and which General Sherman himself deems unnecessary. In how many ways can retrenchment be practiced and the sinking fund be kept intact, and yet sufficient of revenue be had for all the necessary demands of this Government? But were I to acquiesce in the necessity of increased taxation I should never support the pending bill, which I regard in its absolute, unjust, and unequal discrimination in the mode of the proposed increased taxation as a bill of abominations.

Mr. President, the excellence of all governments must rest on justice in its administration. If injustice characterizes its action toward its people then it fails of its objects, and is a sham and a cheat. I know no exact standard of equality in taxation is allowable; but, sir, no one can deny that equal uniformity can be approximated. Upon what principle of justice is it that the industries of a few States by this bill shall be made to contribute two-thirds of the entire revenue of the Government? The ease with which taxes are collected upon such industries affords no strength or support to the injustice in their imposition.

Senators tell us that the people do not feel a whisky tax. They tell us that people do not feel a tobacco tax. Why do they not feel it? Need I tell the American Senate that every people feel any tax a burden which taxes unjustly their industry and reduces their production. Why raise a tax which will diminish your revenue and tend to fraud by the evasion of your revenue laws? Could the framers of the Constitution have ever supposed that the Government would resort to an excise internal tax on the productions of certain States the Government would never have been formed. While I do not deny the power to levy this tax I desire to cite in support of the statement a citation from the debates on the power of Congress to tax exports or to tax the trade between the States in the convention which framed the Constitution. I quote from the Madison Papers, volume 5, page 455, as follows:

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It is best as it stands. The power of regulating trade between the States will protect them against each other. Should this not be the case, the attempts of one to tax the produce of another passing through its hands will force a direct exportation and defeat themselves. There are solid reasons against Congress taxing exports. First, it will discourage industry, as taxes on imports discourage luxury. Secondly, the produce of different States is such as to prevent uniformity in such taxes. There are indeed but a few articles that could be taxed at all, as tobacco, rice, and indigo; and a tax on these alone would be partial and unjust. Thirdly, the taxing of exports would engender incurable jealousies.

Thus spoke Mr. Ellsworth. Hear Elbridge Gerry:

Mr. Gerry was strenuously opposed to the power over exports. It might be made use of to compel the States to comply with the will of the General Government, and to grant it any new powers which might be demanded. We have given it more power already than we know how will be exercised. It will enable the General Government to oppress the States as much as Ireland is oppressed by Great Britain.

It will tax certain industries in the States to the exclusion of others, and will make the burdens too heavy to be borne.

Again, hear one of Virginia's strong men, George Mason:

Colonel MASON. If he were for reducing the States to mere corporations, as seemed to be the tendency of some arguments, he should be for subjecting their exports, as well as imports, to a power of general taxation. He went on a principle often advanced, and in which he concurred, that a majority, when interested, will oppress the minority. This maxim had been verified by our own Legislature (of Virginia.) If we compare the States in this point of view, the eight Northern States have an interest different from the five Southern States; and have, in one branch of the Legislature, thirty-six votes against twenty-nine, and in the other in the proportion of eight against five. The Southern States had, therefore, ground for their suspicions. The case of exports was not the same with that of imports. The latter were the same throughout the States; the former very different. As to tobacco, other nations do raise it, and are capable of raising it, as well as Virginia, &c. The impolicy of taxing that article had been demonstrated by the experiment of Virginia. (Madison Papers, volume 5, pages 454–456.)

These were the opinions of our fathers. What would those revolutionary sages have said if, in that convention which framed the Constitution, power should have been given to some of the States to impose an unequal excise tax upon the agricultural industries and production of a few States? Now, the mere intimation of the exercise of such a power would have defeated the formation of the Government. Gentlemen smile at my assertion. Some Senators would laugh at George Washington if he were to rise from the grave and quote or interpose the Constitution, a bulwark against the dominant party in their unlimited power to tax anything and to discriminate as they please.

Now, Mr. President, this bill proposes to increase the duty on tobacco and whisky; and, if the increase prevail, it must operate unjustly and injuriously to the interest of the producer and the manufacturer of tobacco and of whisky, especially of the former article. I assert it, too, that this bill discriminates most unjustly and arbitrarily in the proposed increase of 4 cents on manufactured tobacco.

In the last nine years tobacco has contributed to the revenue of the United States $267,843,015.97. The States of Missouri, Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina are the four States which have mainly, by their industries, contributed the major portion of this large amount to the Treasury of the United States. You now propose to increase the tax on tobacco. Think of it, Senators. You already tax tobacco 20 cents, and still you desire an additional burden. Senators, you have the power do it, but it is unwise, unjust, and will defeat your object.

The first objection I urge to this increased tax upon tobacco is that it will not increase your revenue one dollar. It will diminish it. It will also check consumption. If this be the result, why enforce the tax? Every grower of tobacco is directly injured to the extent of the diminution in the demand for the raw leaf. This has been the result of our past experience in the internal taxes on whisky and tobacco. The higher the tax, the less the revenue. When the tax on whisky was $2 per gallon we collected little upward of thirteen millions of revenue; while the tax when reduced to 50 cents yielded more than $33,000,000.

The same experience applies to tobacco. When we proposed to reduce the tax of 32 cents to a uniform tax of 20 cents, it was earnestly urged by the opponents of that reduction, backed, too, by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, that the Treasury of the United States would certainly lose $3,000,000 if such diminution of the tax prevailed. The reduction took place. Both taxes of 16 and 32 cents were fixed to a uniform rate of 20 cents. What was the result? How were the predictions as to a loss of revenue fulfilled? Let me tell you. At the rate of 32 and 16 cents tax upon tobaccco the amount of revenue received from that article was $33,570,000. The amount of revenue received after the reduction of the tax to a uniform standard, instead of a decrease, exceeded $34,000,000. Again: During the second fiscal year, after the reduction of said tax, and after the panic whose blighting effects upon every species of business is still fresh in the memory of the country, the revenue receipts on tobacco were $33,200,000. But for the monetary panic the receipts from tobacco would have exceeded thirty-five millions. In proof of this I state that during the first quarter of the present fiscal year the tax received on tobacco is $10,000,000, which, if it continues, will, from tobacco alone, pay into the Treasury $40,000,000, a point never yet reached in the revenue receipts from this article.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has strongly urged the continuance of the tax upon tobacco at the present uniform rate of taxation of 20 cents. In two of his annual reports he has strongly approved of the existing tax. Although the tax of 20 cents has not had a full and fair trial, it has exceeded the Commissioner's most ardent expectations. The existing uniform tax has shown wonderful results. Then, Senators, why will you disturb it? Why attempt to increase it? Cui bono? In whose interest and for what purpose is this unjust and oppressive discriminating tax to be imposed? Nor is the present uniform rate of taxation upon tobacco in its beneficent operation limited to an increase of revenue. The decreased tax has stimulated consumption, and consequently increased the production of the raw material. That, of course, benefits the planter. The impolicy of an increased tax on tobacco is exhibited in the startling fact that while 10,000,000 pounds of the manufactured article is exported, more than 200,000,000 pounds of leaf tobacco in its raw state seeks a foreign market.

So, too, out of the 118,000,000 pounds of tobacco manufactured in the United States only 10,000,000 find a foreign market, the difference between these two amounts being consumed in the United States. Many of the poorest and worthiest of our operatives, white and colored, are among the consumers of this article. Is it just, is it politic, is it wise to make the poor sailor, soldier, or operative pay this increased burden for the little tobacco consumed by them? If you desire to increase revenue, do not disturb this tax. Why abandon the present tax, which has proved so successful in its results? Why experiment in increased burdens when existing ones are so successful? Let well enough alone. Do not by unjust taxation diminish the manufacture of this article in the United States; you will drive the raw material to Canada and other foreign countries for manufacture. This would diminish the amount of manufactured tobacco now contributing so largely to your wants for increased revenue.

Senators, in additon to the tax of 20 cents now imposed upon tobacco, you increase the burden by the high tax on the ingredients which enter into the manufacture of this article. You have a tax of 9 cents in gold on licorice, which you propose to increase to 10 cents in gold, besides a high tariff on sugar. Both licorice and sugar are ingredients in the manufacture of sweet tobacco. It is not often that Congress taxes a raw material. This bill proposes to increase the tax 4 cents per pound on tobacco, but also to increase the tax on licorice and sugar. The manufacturer of tobacco is to pay an increased tax on licorice and sugar as well as an increased tax on manufactered tobacco of 4 cents. The drawback which is usually allowed on other constituent elements in manufactured tobacco is denied on the manufacture of tobacco. Why discriminate so unjustly and unequally both in the ingredients which enter into the manufacture of the staple of a few States and at the same time increase the tax on the manufactured article itself? But the injustice and inequality does not stop there.

I believe it is a fair estimate that every pound of sweet manufactured tobacco contains about 5 per cent. of licorice, to say nothing of the sugar. Estimating the tariff duty on licorice at 9 cents in gold, proposed to be increased by this bill to 10 cents, and what is the result? Upon every thousand pounds of sweet tobacco the manufacturer pays a tax of $200; but in that quality of tobacco estimate 50 pounds of licorice as one of the ingredients. That ingredient pays a tariff duty of 9 per cent. in gold, and in addition an excise tax of 4½ per cent. on the licorice, amounting to $14.50 additional, irrespective of the ingredient of sugar. Therefore, under the present rate of taxation, the 1,000 pounds of sweet manufactured tobacco will be taxed $214.50, and still you insist upon a further tax. Insist upon it, too, with the light of past experience that its imposition will bring less revenue than at the present tax. Do you wish to drive the leaf-tobacco of Kentucky, Virginia, and Missouri to Canada and other foreign countries, where it can meet the ingredients free of duty, and where the cost of its manufacture will be diminished? Already large quantities of the leaf go to Canada? Do you wish to discourage both the consumption and manufacture of tobacco by rash experiments in taxation? Will you take no lesson from the experience of the past that high taxes on whisky and tobacco diminish the revenue?

I beg you, Senators, to pause ere you do such injustice to the manufacturers of tobacco and to the growers of it, which this bill will entail upon them. Let no action of yours diminish the manufacture of this great staple in our own country. Such must be the operation of your proposed legislation. Do not strike at the labor and capital invested in the manufacture of tobacco.

I am surprised at some of my republican friends in their advocacy of this tax upon another ground: the dominant majority claim that they are the exclusive friends of the colored race. It was but yesterday, or the day before, that the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] read us a lecture on this side of the Chamber——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not read it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I beg the Senator's pardon. He did not read, he spoke it; and spoke as he always does, earnestly and well. He is always interesting and commands the attention and respect of the Senate whenever he speaks. His speech, as usual, was an indictment against the democratic party. It was pressed with ardor. He charged that the Democracy were the enemies of the colored race, opposed to freedom, opposed to all recognition of any of their rights, oppressive in their treatment of them. The Senator was more earnest than just. His indictment was not supported by the facts. We deny all inhumanity to the colored man. We protest against the charge that we are not his friends. We desire to withhold from him no right that the Constitution accords him. But for myself, and I speak for myself alone, it is true that I would not, if I had my way, place the colored race in positions for which they are not competent to fill.

I would be just, humane, and do all in my power to contribute to their prosperity and happiness. But I am not for civil-rights bills. I am not for elevating a race which for four centuries, under God's providence, have been shut out from the light of freedom, and demand the privileges of education and culture, without qualification, without knowledge, without experience, elevated to high positions of trust and responsibility, for which most of them are not prepared. Especially will I never contribute to this result in order to get their political support. I will give them the rights which the Constitution accords them. I will aid in their improvement and advancement, but when, without education, you ask me——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why was he not educated?

Mr. STEVENSON. Why were they permitted for four thousand years to be slaves? Why have not negroes been educated everywhere? Because, like all inferior races, they have been made subservient to their superiors. Why have they not been educated in the colonies of England? Why have they not been educated in Jamaica or San Domingo? Why not educated or elevated in the Northern States? Why not in Vermont? Why have not the constituency of the Senator from Vermont manifested their zeal in placing the colored citizens instantly on the platform of political equality by elevating them to legislative and judicial positions? Simply, I presume, because the good people in that section did not think the colored people qualified for such civil or political elevation. In my own Commonwealth we are providing in our own way for the education of this race; and—the North, not the South, was responsible for the continuance of slavery.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We also did in New England.

Mr. STEVENSON. And because we refuse to elevate or refused to recognize the colored race as fit for such positions of governmental trusts or social equality we are assailed as a party. Sir, I repel indignantly the insinuation, come from where it may, that I am not as humane, as just, and will not go as far as the farthest in kindness to the colored man in according him his rights under the law; but I will never agree to elevate him to a position of either social equality or political equality and promotion, unless I believe he has the elements to discharge his duty properly and intelligently to the whole body-politic.

But, Mr. President, to come back to this bill. A more fatal blow at the prosperity of the colored race was never struck than will follow the passage of this bill. The manufacture of tobacco is the only manufacturing industry, besides agriculture, for which the colored race has ever shown the least capacity. In that he exhibits both skill and aptitude. There are in the city of Richmond, as I learn at this moment, 5,000 colored people engaged in the various tobacco manufactories in that city, with 20,000 dependent on that labor. Add Lynchburgh, Danville, Petersburgh, and the number of colored operatives employed in tobacco manufactories, and you might swell their number and their dependents to 75,000. Are these people to be discharged? If your legislation shall cause the capital thus employed in this industry to be diverted, such must be its effect.

The very fact that these colored operatives are employed in such large numbers by southern people in Southern States is a full answer to the imputation that they desire to oppress that race. Let me tell the honorable Senator from Vermont that the North not the South is responsible for the continuance of slavery for years and years, and that when southern men proposed to abolish it the North and East said "No, no; not yet!" They wished their ships to be employed in the carrying of slaves.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who were responsible for its final abolition?

Mr. STEVENSON. The war was the direct agency in the abolition of slavery.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose the Senator claims the benefit of abolition by the war?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir; I claim no such thing. I have taken to myself no credit for the extinction or continuance of slavery. I am defending myself and those with whom I agree politically from the assaults of the Senator from Vermont, which are wholly undeserved. If he goes back into that history to hold the democracy responsible for slavery, I tell him, and I am prepared to prove it, that it was the North, actuated by pecuniary considerations, and not the South, that continued the existence of slavery and the slave-trade. But enough of this discussion.

I repeat that this increased tax and unjust discrimination against the manufacturer of tobacco is a direct blow to the colored laborer. It cannot be gainsaid. But there is another reason why I oppose this bill. It discriminates unjustly against tobacco in another particular, to the exclusion of other objects of taxation in the bill. The fifth section of this bill says:

That the increase of duties provided by this act shall not apply to any goods, wares, or merchandise actually on shipboard—and bound to the United States on or before the 10th day of February, 1875, nor on any such goods, wares, or merchandise on deposit in warehouses or public stores at the date of the passage of this act.

Why not apply that exemption to tobacco? Why do you exclude tobacco on hand and in bond from this same exemption that you give to foreign goods on shipboard? Every Senator knows that all the tobacco in the factories is in bond. Why require a tax on tobacco on hand and exempt whisky? Why exempt goods, wares, and merchandise on hand from tax, and yet exclude tobacco from its operation? You know the large quantity of manufactured tobacco on hand; you know the scarcity of money and how hard it is to be raised, especially in the Southern States; you exclude merchandise on hand and on shipboard; you exclude whisky in store; but you impose it on tobacco. How unjust, how unequal, how oppressive! Then the bill provides—

That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, by testimony under oath, that any person liable to pay the increased tax by this section imposed had, prior to the 10th day of February, 1875, made a contract for the future delivery of such tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes, at a fixed price, which contract was in writing prior to that date, such tobacco may be delivered to the contracting party entitled thereto, under special permit from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue provided therefor, without previous payment of such additional tax; but the said additional tax shall be a lien thereon, and shall be paid by and collected from the purchaser under such contract before the sale or removal thereof by him, and when demanded by the collector of internal revenue for the district to which the same shall be removed for delivery to the purchaser.

That clause imposes a tax on the manufacturer, as I will demonstrate. If I on the 10th day of February as a manufacturer of tobacco had concluded a written agreement with the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to sell him one thousand boxes of manufactured tobacco at a fixed price to be delivered at a future day, the Senator from Illinois would on the passage of this bill decline to execute the contract. He would say, The Government has put an additional tax of 4 cents a pound on the tobacco since my contract; I cannot afford to pay it, and I therefore decline to comply, and the contract is at an end. What, then, becomes of the one thousand boxes of tobacco? The purchaser declines, the increased tax falls of course upon the manufacturer.

Now I put it to Senators to say why single out for taxation a solitary industry for unequal and oppressive taxation. It is unjust to all the tobacco States, but especially so to Virginia and North Carolina, which have not recovered from the effects of the war. Why increase the burdens of this already oppressive taxation? Why not tax other branches of business? Why not tax brokers' sales? I insist that it is unjust. I insist that it is unequal. I insist it is an unequal discrimination unworthy the representatives of a free people. Why create resistance to your taxes? Why make your burdens so unequal as to invite fraud in escaping the payment of your internal excise taxes? It will in every aspect operate injuriously, and I deny your equitable right to invite capital into the manufacture of a particular and special industry at a specified rate of taxation and then suddenly increase the tax without exempting the stock on hand.

So, too, the same might be said in regard to whisky; but that discrimination is not half so oppressive and unjust as it is in regard to tobacco. The whisky in bond is exempted—the tobacco is not. I deny that the poor faithful white or colored operative, when he requires all the little earnings that his manual labor can afford for the sustenance of his family, should contribute an equal tax in his consumption of either tobacco or whisky into the coffers of the United States Treasury, when there are so many objects of revenue, which if subjected to moderate taxation would produce millions of revenue that now escape all taxation. Yet, how do Senators reconcile such glaring injustice? Why not amend this bill and exempt tobacco on hand? Why oppress one class when your oppression will not increase your revenue?

We collected with a tax of 50 cents a gallon upon whisky more revenue, in my judgment, than you will ever collect again at any larger amount. You may put it to merely 70 cents; you may put it up to a dollar or even two, and your revenue will be diminished one-half. The statistics of the internal revenue will attest the truth of this statement. You invite fraud on your revenue when you increase your tax beyond the point which the manufacturer can pay.

By way of illustration: when whisky was taxed $2 per gallon the whole amount of whisky made in the United States amounted to 6,000,000 gallons, when we all know that Kentucky alone made very nearly 50,000,000 gallons; and that is always the case when you attempt to levy unjust taxes which the industry will not bear.

Senators, protection for protection's sake has been a curse to this land. It has driven our commerce from the seas, it has paralyzed industry, and has oppressed our people. It is time that legislation for privileged classes had ceased. I am for imposing taxes for the object of revenue, with incidental protection, in this bill.

And now, Mr. President, not intending to say when I arose half of what I have said, I shall cease to tire the Senate. I am not satisfied that, with rigid economy in our expenditures, the present revenue is not sufficient to dispense with increased taxes. Even if it was not, then I demand and insist, before you increase the taxes on the industries of Missouri, Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and other States, that you shall stop your wasteful expenditure of the public money. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] desires to spend $300,000 for the decoration of this Capitol. He wishes to put certain abutments around the base of the Capitol at this session, which will cost the amount stated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. My friend the Senator from Kentucky when we had made an appropriation for Covington desired to have it increased for the adornment of Covington at $150,000, and at his importunity I induced the committee to report it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I never, Mr. President, have demanded one dollar for the decoration of a public building in Covington or elsewhere. I did demand for my State and for my city at the hands of this Government the erection of public buildings, as I had a right to do. When Maine and Vermont and small States have public buildings at three or four points, then I say a city like Covington is entitled justly to a plain, substantial building that shall not cost, with ground included, more than $250,000. No, Mr. President, the public interests demand the speedy erection of our public buildings in Covington and the enlargement of the custom-house at Louisville. That is all I have asked, and that the public interests demand. Nothing that in his judgement does not tend to the public interests has the Senator from Kentucky ever demanded. He would prefer to borrow money if the public credit demanded it rather than to vote for the irregular taxation imposed by this bill.

When the evil protective policies of the dominant party cease, the country will prosper. When arbitrary power is rebuked and the Executive is restrained within the limitations of the Constitution; when subsidies of $500,000 or $1,000,000 a year are given up, then prosperity and low taxes will be inaugurated. If we desire to perpetuate free representative self-government, let us show our faith by our works—uphold the Constitution, practice economy, preserve the rights of the States.

I cannot give my assent to this bill, and I hope it will be defeated. If I have spoken warmly, it is because the interest of those who have made me in part the guardian of their rights have demanded a protest of the injustice which its provisions will impose upon them. Time will show whether my predictions as to the loss of revenue are true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to say a word on that amendment. It is hardly necessary to do so after what was said by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Kentucky; but it is a matter of such gross injustice that in the same bill in which we tax liquor and tobacco and impose duties upon articles from abroad, you only tax liquor to be made hereafter, and only tax goods to be imported and bought hereafter, while you tax tobacco already made and on hand, that I desire to say a word about it.

The first section of the bill distinctly declares—

> That from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits thereafter produced.

All the liquor already made pays the old tax. The new tax is only to be applicable to the liquor hereafter to be made. And so in the fifth section it is provided—

> That the increase of duties provided by this act shall not apply to any goods, wares, or merchandise actually on shipboard and bound to the United States on or before the 10th day of February, 1875, nor on any such goods, wares, or merchandise on deposit in warehouses or public stores at the date of the passage of this act.

Then goods already in warehouses, goods on deposit in public stores at the date of this act are exempt from the increased tax imposed by the act; but how is it in Virginia and other Southern States, where large quantities of tobacco have been manufactured and are now in bonded warehouses, made when the tax was 20 cents a pound? That tobacco stands exactly on the same footing as the liquor stands, and yet the proposition is to exempt the old liquor and old goods and impose a tax on the old tobacco. It is a piece of such gross injustice that I cannot imagine that the Senate can insist upon it. It is plain that it is so. There cannot be any doubt as to the meaning of the bill. The bill is as plain as possible, and unless it is amended we shall be guilty of the gross injustice of seeming to make a discrimination and making it against an interest that is produced in the States that would suffer most from any increase of taxes, against a class who suffer more than any other class.

The Senator from Kentucky has shown to the Senate how much the laboring class of colored people in the South will suffer from this tax. The colored people are the skilled mechanics in the manufacture of tobacco. Go to the tobacco manufactories and there you will find them filled with men, women, and children, boys and girls, four or five hundred in a single room, depending on it for a livelihood, all or most of them skillful hands. It is upon that class of people that this tax will largely fall, and it will have a bad effect upon wages and people.

Therefore I do trust the Senate will at least adopt the amendment I have proposed, so as to put tobacco on the footing of whisky and on the footing of imported goods already in bonded warehouses.

Mr. MERRIMON. Without entering on the discussion of this bill, which I should like to do if the hour were not so late, I move to strike out the first and second sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. MERRIMON. This amendment embraces the amendment already offered. Are not two amendments in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia is first in order.

Mr. MERRIMON. This amendment would embrace his amendment, if carried.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia is to amend the section. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is to strike out the section. The question first is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to perfect the section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, whether this amendment is important or not, I trust it will not be made. To me it seems very unimportant from the fact that I have no doubt that every possessor of tobacco, like every possessor of liquor, has availed himself of the notice which has been given of the pendency of this bill, and has already secured the advantage of the lowest rate of tax by paying his tax upon it. There is no sort of doubt in relation to the subject of liquors, and I presume that the dealers in tobacco are as wide awake as those possessed of spirituous liquors.

Again, Mr. President, there is something of a difference between the two subjects. Tobacco can only be produced once a year. "Hereafter produced" would apply only to the succeeding crop, coming into market in a year, whereas in relation to liquors, they are produced night and day, whenever the distilleries can get a supply of corn.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? It is manufactured tobacco that this tax is upon, and that is produced day and night. Tobacco only grows once a year, but tobacco is manufactured every day and night, as liquor is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is true; but when it is manufactured they pay the duties and then they get the higher price for it if they make it before the higher duties are levied. If they do not manufacture it until afterward, then they not only pay but they get the higher duty, and lose nothing.

Now, a word in relation to this particular amendment. As I read the RECORD, I find that this proposition was proposed by a gentleman in the House of Representatives from Virginia, and it was made, as I suppose, precisely as he desired to have it, representing a land that produces more tobacco than any other of the Union. Now, in addition to this, let me say that all the tobacco that is raised in this country for export—and a very large share is raised for export—goes free of any tax whatever.

I do not desire to prolong this discussion; I only desire to perform my simple duty. If there is any one to whom it ought to give a pleasure to vote against this bill, or to find fault with it, I can say that perhaps it would give me as much personal gratification to find fault and vote against the bill as anybody; but I hold my public duty to be paramount here, and it is a duty that I desire to discharge faithfully to the country and to the Government. I know very well that it is much easier to find fault and pick flaws in a bill than to make one perfect. I have never seen one, either for taxes or duties, that I thought was perfect. I presume that is the experience of every member present. There never will be one that will accurately fit the minds and consciences of all men. They must be as a matter of course more or less the subject of compromise. The only question is whether we shall pass a bill that will enable the Government to conduct its business with decency and respect for the next coming year. I think that I have discharged my duty in relation to this bill, and I am ready that the vote shall be taken upon it and have the sense of the Senate thereon. If it shall fail, the responsibility will be upon those who vote against it. I do not desire to share any part, great or small, of that responsibility.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this bill at this hour, though I had intended to make some remarks in reference to the subject. I wish to say, however, that this bill in my opinion is objectionable not so much in its details as in the absence of any necessity for increased taxation; and yet the details of the bill I conceive to be objectionable. I find by looking through it that an interest in which the people of the West are largely concerned is very heavily taxed; an interest in which the people of the Middle States are concerned is also very heavily taxed; while the fourth section of the bill is designed to benefit parties interested in the manufacturing and commercial interests of the country. The bill in its details, therefore, is objectionable; but I do not rise to discuss the details. I wish, however, to say that in my judgment there is no necessity for an increase of taxation upon the people of this country at the present time.

All that I have heard advanced in favor of imposing the taxation provided for in this bill is that it is needed to supply the wants of the sinking fund. It is apparent that since the sinking fund was first provided for by law there has been a greater reduction of the public debt than if there had been since 1862 a strict compliance with the law then enacted with reference to the sinking fund. There has been, I believe, about six or seven hundred million dollars of the public debt extinguished; and that is more than 1 per cent. of the public debt annually would have amounted to if it had gone into operation in 1862. The law which provided for the sinking fund was enacted in 1862, and yet no observance of that law was had until 1869.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to occupy time, but I must correct the honorable Senator from Delaware. Although it was not kept formally as a sinking fund, yet in actual fact more than 1 per cent. was paid every year from the passage of the law.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is true, I have no doubt; but yet the point I wish to make is that the payment was not made for the purpose of complying with that law; that while there was a reduction of the public debt, it was not done because of the mandate of the law of 1862.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, I can state from my own personal knowledge that both Mr. McCulloch and Mr. Chase held that it was a full compliance with the law to apply the 1 per cent. of the amount of the public debt to the payment or extinction of the bonds, and the bonds were actually bought, although there was no sinking-fund account opened.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is the very point I make. No sinking-fund account was opened. I admit there was a decrease of the public debt, and there has been now a decrease of the public debt beyond what it would have been if there had been only a literal observance of the law of 1862. We have paid more than six hundred millions of the public debt, as I understand, and that is a greater sum than 1 per cent. annually on the public debt from 1862 to the present time would have amounted to.

Mr. THURMAN. I can give my friend the figures if he wishes them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall be glad to have them.

Mr. THURMAN. The public debt reached its highest amount on the 1st of March, 1866, when it was $2,707,856,000. One the 1st of May, 1874, it was reduced to $2,145,268,000, being a reduction of $562,589,000. If the law had been literally executed in regard to the sinking fund, accumulating interest every year and applying that to the sinking fund, it would have amounted to only $525,000,000, so that there has been $37,000,000 more paid than the sinking-fund law required.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That was my understanding. Now it is urged that a literal compliance with the law establishing the sinking fund is necessary to maintain good faith to the bondholders of the country. Why, sir, every one knows that the legislation of Congress has been in the interest of the bondholders, to the detriment of the note-holders of the country. When the honorable Senator from Massachusetts was Secretary of the Treasury he labored assiduously and successfully to advance the credit of the Government abroad, to make the holders in foreign countries of the bonds of the United States satisfied as to the ultimate payment of that debt. I never thought that the policy pursued by the Secretary in that respect was a wise policy. While I had no objection to the bonds of the country being appreciated in value, I wanted to see the notes for which the Government was responsible, the greenbacks, advance in value in the hands of the holders in this country. The bonds of the country had been purchased at almost nominal values, and from an estimate which I have seen the clear profit, with interest upon the profit, amounts at the present time to over a thousand million of dollars, made by the holders of the bonds of the United States. Most of that went into the hands of the foreign bondholders, and they have no right to complain. In fact, I am sure they are fully satisfied that the Government of the United States will provide amply and fully for maintaining, at least at their par value, or probably at their present value, the bonds of the United States in the markets of the world.

There is therefore no necessity for a literal compliance with the law establishing the sinking fund for the purpose of complying with any contract, express or implied, with the bondholders of this country. And now is this a time to increase taxation when every interest of the country is almost paralyzed? We have a vast country, ample in resources; the very bowels of our earth are filled with mineral wealth; our fields are as fruitful as the lands of any country on earth; and yet our industries are to-day languishing. What is the reason of it? One reason is found in the fact that the energies of the people of this country have been crippled by taxation. Since the present Administration came into power there has been collected from the people of this country an amount equal almost or quite equal to the present existing debt of the country. In the last six years, according to your financial reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury, there has been an average of more than $300,000,000 collected annually. What has become of it? Not exceeding $700,000,000 of those $1,900,000,000 were required to pay the interest on the public debt, and from thirteen to fourteen hundred million dollars have gone either to the extinguishment of the public debt or been exhausted in the ordinary expenditures of the Government. This taxation upon the people of the country has trammeled the industries and the energies of the country. It is no wonder that we have hard times, no wonder that people are complaining, no wonder that men are out of employment, for the industries of this country have been crippled by the enormous taxes that have been drawn from the people. I am therefore against any increased taxation unless there is an absolute necessity for it. I would go as far as any Senator on this floor to maintain the credit of the Government and meet all its liabilities and meet all its obligations. But we have to economize; we shall have to come down to economy in our national expenditures as well as in our individual expenditures before we can have good times again. I find that when my income is shortened, I have to curtail my expenses; and that is the true policy for governments as well as individuals. Can we not economize? Is there any necessity that there should be now from one hundred and eighty to two hundred million dollars paid annually for the ordinary expenses of this Government? Why, sir, when democrats ruled this country you cried out that $70,000,000 was extravagant; you turned out Mr. Buchanan's administration because you said it was extravagant and because the resources of the country were not equal to the expenditures of the Government. Let gentlemen go back, let them bring back the expenditures of the Government to the strict principles of economy, and there will be no necessity for additional taxation; you will have all the money that you need, not only to meet the interest of the public debt, not only to carry on the Government and meet all its ordinary expenses, but leave ample means to provide for the sinking fund, if that is an object so dearly to be cherished.

Mr. President, I did not rise to enter into any discussion of this question, but I wished to record my vote and to raise my voice in opposition to increased taxation on the people of this country at the present time. In my judgment there is no necessity for it, and we ought to begin to economize and to take off the people the burdens which have been imposed by our extravagance as a government.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I propose to make a statement on this occasion. I hate at any time to rise to address the Senate, and especially at an hour so late as the present; and if there is no objection, as my remarks are merely intended for my own gratification and reference hereafter, I will ask permission that they may be taken by the reporter and printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; that is a bad precedent.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is not a bad precedent, because my statement, is very short, and it will not be of interest to any other Senator. It will only be of interest to me, and simply as a matter of record so as to be easy of reference hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island how long his remarks will be?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I cannot tell.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I shall be very glad to hear him. This thing has never been done. We ought to hear the Senator.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, the people of the United States must abandon all hope of relief from Congress. Since the war no enemy could have exercised more injurious influence on business than has been effected by congressional and departmental action. Members of Congress cannot perceive that the stability of government and parties depends entirely on the stability of business, or that there are general laws that underlie the whole business system, which must be understood before any remedy can be adopted for their irregularities. Members of Congress are not familiar with business, and their profession, and its practice especially, unfits them to perceive the general laws that underlie it. Business men are only familiar with the business they have been educated into, and are also unfamiliar with the laws governing all business.

Congress is composed entirely, or almost entirely, of lawyers. Their occupation is that of conflict or war. The courts are the arena where the conflicts are decided, the sheriffs the arms which enforce the decrees.

Some have thought that the ancient way of deciding quarrels, by force of arms, developed a better manhood than is developed under our laws. The barons of the Middle Ages had quite as much social peace among their followers as any court in our land enforces among the people where it exercises jurisdiction.

The character of the persons composing Congress could not under any possible circumstances effect peace, for their nature and education are amid conflicts.

Business and industries languish amid social convulsion more surely than when the nation is engaged in war.

The conflicts which have engaged the attention of parties and the Government since the war have been far more destructive to business and industries than while the war was being prosecuted.

Armed forces quartered on a people could not more thoroughly destroy industries than have the conflicts which have engaged business interests with one another since the war.

The Senator from New Jersey, referring to the late Senator Buckingham, referred to the moral influences which underlie society and the political influences that affect the outer surface of society.

Moral influences are one thing, political influences another thing. Political influence takes the form of political law, or that we recognize as law, while moral influence is of the people, originates in personal character, which, individually or in union with other individuals, directs and carries forward a community by carrying a c nsiderable number, the balance of the community accustoming themselves to it into a well regulated life, and the political law acts when the moral influences fail in direction and regulation. The political law is not to act until the moral influence fails, and then is to act separately. If the makers of laws could once understand when the law penetrates among the whole people it drives off the moral law there would be great gain to the people. What is it that prevents the moral influences from acting? It is obstacles, which come from a power that represents itself in rapacity, cupidity, and avarice. These usurp the moral influence in all communities. What can remove such obstacles? The same element which gives rise to them—money; money directed to form a current or influence about which all money and valuables will accommodate themselves. No political law can reach rapacity, cupidity, and avarice. These usurp the law and bend it to their power. No more can law operate when all moral influences cease in a community. A minister of the gospel would legislate according to the teaching and the dogmas of his church or religion; a doctor would legislate according to his practice; a business man would make laws suited to his particular business experience. Suppose Congress was composed of all ministers of the Methodist Church, or doctors of the homeopathic practice, or business men engaged in the packing of pork, or of men in iron manufacture, what would the people think? Would the people not properly attribute all evil times to that circumstance? Certainly, and with great good reason. How much more should they attribute the present deterioration to the fact that men removed from all connection with people, except in connection with these quarrels, have the supreme power in making the laws and directing the policy of the country. Therefore the people must abandon all hope of any relief from Congress. It would be simply a miracle should any good come to them. The days of miracles have passed.

Wherever there has existed a sacred sentiment in the hearts of any people, individual efforts to usurp it are unceasing, and success always in the end attends these efforts.

In this country the law has already usurped the Constitution and the liberties of the people; the law has usurped the sacred memories that hovered over the blue-coated soldier, and has prostituted him to its greed for power.

Centuries elapsed before those holding on to the sacred sentiments of the religion promulgated to the world by Jesus Christ and his expounders became aware that it had been usurped and prostituted to the vilest purposes, and they were worshiping instead the worst despotism, the most corrupt power, the world had ever witnessed.

The people of the United States had a sacred sentiment favoring the law, because to them it had a contrary appearance from the forms representing a monarchy, an aristocracy, a caste, or a class. This it is that enforces among them quiet, in them strength, under provocations that would have produced revolution everywhere where men are really free; and now in their weakness, they are forced into a submission more abject than that which exists among the lowest of men. Had one-tenth the enormities been practiced by a king, an aristocracy, a caste, a class, that has arisen in the name of the law, the people would long since have risen up and put an end to their suffering by striking down their oppressors.

Every usurpation that ever existed has in its turn fallen, its usurpations usurped by another.

What has usurped the law in this country? A power which, because of its irregular action, has become represented and controlled by force of rapacity, cupidity, and avarice. The moral, intellectual, and physical nature of the usurper has become deformed, unnatural; the Government of the United States has become lunatic. Whatever party arises to power assumes the Government thus constituted. The force of rapacity, cupidity, and avarice is a hundred times more powerful than parties or people, because it has usurped both. These startling facts, crystallized in the minds and hearts of thinking people, may save popular government, republican ideas, individual liberty, and prosperity; nothing else will. Civilization under our flag is in greater danger to-day than ever before, and no hope remains except from a comprehension of the causes which endanger it and a speedy action from the best minds of the country. Congress is, as I have before stated, incapable of procuring any principles outside of the law; the executive department has become the agent of the demoralizing power that hovers around it; the judiciary the humble instrument of executive power and of prevailing material power among the people. The wisest plans of evil plotters and actors often prove those which cause their downfall; and if the best minds of the country are awakened to the dangers to the Republic by the employment of the Federal soldier at New Orleans, I shall almost rejoice that the sacred memories that have heretofore clustered around him have been prostituted and made horrible at the insatiate demand of greed and power.

The mind must see. If the mind does not act independent, every object that meets the eye, in confused times, distracts the mind. Distraction of mind is its certain subordination to prevailing power. Because of distracted and subordinated mind, it becomes impossible for those who mingle amid the conflict of interests and of political parties to perceive that there is a principle that underlies the forms of government, and which exists among the people, and if that principle is seized on and directed will organize the supreme material forces existing among the people into regular action, on which society will accommodate itself and government be secured in stability and permanency; and where there exists any considerable sum of material values without the appreciation and application of the principle independent of the law, society becomes turbulent, industries vanish, law is ineffectual, and government is overthrown. The action of the material forces among the people forces their legislation into the hands of lawyers, and subjects the lawyer to the same force, which, when supreme, exhibits its character in the form of cupidity, rapacity, and avarice, and these forces effect ignorance in legislation and corruption among the people. These forces destroy all industries and business uninfluenced by speculation; these forces operate to override all restraining influence, and in lieu thereof inaugurate a rule of force and bitter and armed conflict between the people and the government.

What is that principle? An agency with power derived from the people independent of the law, which first divides the supreme money forces, then directs one of the parts into such channels that its decentralization is made sure; the other divided portion accommodates itself to the parts so directed, so that the whole money forces among the people is drawn into an organized power of decentralization and distribution.

Without this system, where there exists any considerable sums of values among the people, demoralization and crime will be the rule among the people; increasing centralization of the power in the Federal Government will go on; the powers of the State government will decrease in the same ratio; the Federal Government inevitably driven into corruption and decay; the people brought into poverty and insanity. And all this, to a large extent, comes to the better class of the people; and there is no power under Heaven, other than I have indicated, to prevent it.

In 1869 I indicated the modes necessary to accommodate the principle. The form a bank, therefore prostituted in this country to the vilest purpose, by reason of which the mind was turned away from a great truth because it was coupled with a bad name, and there existed nowhere in Congress or among the people intelligence enough to perceive it. I found myself very much in the condition of all discoverers, surrounded by a pack of hounds, who have followed me ever since. The principle I contended for, and its mode of action, which in England, Prussia, and Russia has measurable healthy and virtuous action, is in France prostituted to the vilest purpose. The condition of the respective governments indicate, by the poverty and slavery of the great mass of people of France, by the independence and strength of the mass of the people in the nations enumerated, the correctness of my conclusion. I therefore take no kind of interest in all the efforts otherwise directed to save constitutional government, independence to the people, and stability to their social and industrial affairs. All such efforts have failed, and will fail most ruinously. I have not persisted in the agitation I commenced in 1869 on this question, because I could do nothing alone; there was not a man to support me. I was encompassed by a class of people I was endeavoring to serve. And these even to-day are a melancholy satisfaction for the trouble and losses these acts have occasioned me, in consequence of words employed for no other purpose whatever but to secure safety to the Government and prosperity to the people. I prayed and begged Presidents and members long before I published my words to at least listen. These seats filled by new men, and the prospective vacating of others, indicate the prophetic truths of the words I spoke to them. But, sir, this is not the end. The Government itself is held up by the merest thread. A whiff of wind almost will blow it to atoms. And I have come to the conclusion that nothing can come that will be productive of good except such a disposition of the Government be reached by a reassembling of the atoms by men free from the power which at this moment sways our affairs. In these remarks I have nothing to do with political parties. They sink in presence of this great question to the level of the meanest individual in the land.

The bill before the Senate is to further burden the people. At a time like the present to further tax the people is a far more heinous act than that which the revolutionary fathers resisted. All the industrial interests are being rapidly ruined by your past and present policy. The great agricultural interest, already prostrate, is forced to pay 30 per cent. additional tax on two articles it relies on for the mere living of the people engaged in it, and in support of a system which increases their poverty. Rhode Island looks on with apparent complacency. Her money will receive a larger reward. But her industries are injured by the 10 per cent. additional duty, inasmuch as its effect will be to force them to a larger expenditure for a larger capital required, and thus strengthen the power of the money-lender over them. Her industries employ imported articles which are raised

10 per cent. by this bill. These must have that increase from the purchaser. The increased money requirements increases its price to the consumers of her productions and limits the sale of them. She is therefore injured in both ways. Rhode Island depends for her prosperity on that of every part of the country. If she is wise, she views both the fact and the cause of the unsettled condition of a portion of the country with great dissatisfaction. But I fear she is not wise. I hope, however, she is not imbued with that spirit which makes a great financial agent of the Federal Government, and one who holds largely of its bonded debt, say, viewing the disturbed state of things. Confer unlimited power on the General Government and bayonet the people South.

At any rate, whether Rhode Island wishes this bill to pass or not, it cannot with my vote. Except for the payment of pensions, the large appropriations of Government is good to none but to those who derive their living from them. I might except the Indian appropriation, which keeps a crowd of adventurers among the Indians who measurably protect the settler. All else, even the post-office, could be secured at a trifling cost.

The almost insane efforts to make the national debt seem sacred in the hands of those who secured it at one-half its present value and the measures taken to increase that price long after any necessities for borrowing by the Government had ended, was and is, in my judgment, a crime of enormous magnitude. The laws and Treasury manipulations pressed on to secure that result have been the cause of the more rapid ruin to industries, and partake of the same character.

The sacred sentiment which has been raised up on the Federal debt has been usurped by as criminal a set of cormorants as ever surrounded a confiding and simple hearted legislator, and if it were not for the magnitude of the injuries effected thereby, would be looked upon as an act of childish folly. I know of nothing half as sacred as keeping poverty from the door of the people. The debt as it has been manipulated and as it is now manipulated increases the poverty of the people. As a debt; not merely the interest that is paid on it. And as it stands to-day, its sacredness has become a crime against nature. I shall vote against every item of increased taxation.

This, then, is the principle to be established: An agency which will create in material affairs the some movement which the upper and under currents perform for the atmosphere, the upper and under currents in the ocean, the system in man, which takes the life particle from the lungs into the heart, from thence through the veins to every part of the body; then, returning receiving a new supply of life-giving particles, and from the arteries carries the same forward to the heart, then to the lungs, and thus the circulation becomes ample. Organize your material system on the methods nature provides for her living elements, keeping nature uppermost and material as a mere stimulant to nature, and all will be well. Nobody seems to realize that unless our material system is equal in healthy action to the best-regulated action of the material forces of any other people, we must take a second place, and that is a ruinous place, if we have intimate relations with the people having superior advantages. England, Prussia, and Russia have such to-day. Every people have within themselves power to create within themselves all the capital necessary for any purpose whatever. The United States have advantages beyond any people that ever existed, and yet our people have heretofore been driven to London for the smallest accommodation. Now, there is ample capital in this country, because capital has become alienated from industries, first having exhausted the life in them, and now cannot resuscitate them or create new ones. We created every dollar of capital necessary to carry on the war, and not until our success was assured did we get a dollar from foreign capitalists. These and their allies in this country the sacred sentiment is agitated to benefit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is in section 2, lines 11, 12, and 13, to strike out—

Not apply to tobacco on which the tax under existing law shall have been paid when this act takes effect,

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Only apply to tobacco manufactured after the passage of this act.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to say that I shall regard the adoption of this amendmeut as decisive of the fate of the bill. If Senators are prepared to say that the sinking fund shall no longer be kept up; that the public buildings shall no longer be continued; that those already commenced shall be abandoned; that no river and harbor appropriations shall be made, and that various other inroads on the ordinary appropriations shall be made; they will of course vote so as to defeat the bill.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I had given up the intention of speaking on this bill, hoping the Senate would soon come to a vote; but I must confess it makes me a little impatient to hear the advocates of this bill repeat time and again that unless we mean to abandon the sinking fund, unless we mean to stop the improvement of rivers and harbors, unless we mean to arrest the whole machinery of Government—in one word, unless we want the country to go to perdition, we must necessarily pass this bill; pass it just as it is presented to us, without changing a word. Now, what is this bill? It is a bill to levy taxes upon the people; to increase the burdens already weighing heavily upon them. Indeed it appears to me that especially under the circumstances which at this time surround us, the business of the country languishing, many people in distress, it behooves us carefully to consider whether in fact any new taxation is needed; and if so, what kind of tax should and can be levied without unduly burdening the people. We ought not to act upon such a measure lightly or in hot haste. It is a delicate matter, calling for the maturest consideration. The question whether additional taxation is absolutely needed has been discussed by others. I shall not go over the same ground again. I shall speak upon the supposition that more revenue be required. I agree, then, with the Senator from Vermont, who has the bill in charge, that this should strictly be a revenue measure; that is to say, that the money taken from the people by the operation of this measure shall go into the Treasury of the United States, and nowhere else. We shall see whether it is such a revenue measure as it pretends to be. Not a single gentleman upon this floor advocating this bill, except the Senator from Pennsylvania, omitted to say that the bill was very far from what he desired; that in fact the measure was a very unsatisfactory one. Even the Senator from Vermont, who now tells us that we must, absolutely must, take this bill exactly as it stands, unless this Republic is to go to perdition—even he told us in his opening speech that he did not like this measure, that he would be exceedingly glad to throw it aside and to construct and vote for a better one if he were permitted to do so. All I desire is to permit him to do so.

Sir, what are the provisions of this bill? In the first place we are to raise the tax on whisky. I think we ought to have been taught by experience that the tax on whisky is an exceedingly difficult and delicate one to handle. Experience tells us that the success of the revenue service in collecting the whisky tax, or I might say the possibility of collecting it, grows less almost in proportion as the tax is raised above a certain figure. At present we are told that the whisky tax is reasonably well collected, all but 5 per cent. We seem, therefore, to have reached what may be called the revenue point. As soon as we go beyond that we have to take uncertain chances, with no assurance at all as to whether we shall collect more or less tax after the increase, the probability being against us. Moreover we are told by the chairman of the Committee on Finance himself that for about two-thirds of the year the increase of the tax on whisky proposed here will not yield any additional revenue at all, or at least not much.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I said that much. I said the supply on hand was about two-thirds of a year's supply, but undoubtedly revenue will be received before the whole stock on hand is exhausted. The Senator can understand it. I believe I said I thought little would be received until August or September.

Mr. SCHURZ. And not much would be likely to be manufactured until that stock was disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if he does not suppose that about the same amount will be on hand a year hence that is on hand now or six months hence? In other words, have not retail dealers always kept, and will they not always keep about the same amount of stock on hand?

Mr. SHERMAN. Every Senator can judge of that as well as I can.

Mr. SCHURZ. It seems that the chairman of the Committee on Finance is not ready to say what the Senator from Vermont wants him to say.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Nor what the Senator from Missouri wants him to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a question of which every one can judge as well as I.

Mr. SCHURZ. At any rate there has not been a single Senator on this floor who thought an additional tax on whisky advisable, and the Senator from Vermont himself told us if he were free to construct a tax bill he would by no means advise an increase of 20 cents per gallon.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That was not precisely what I said. I said I would make it about 85 cents instead of 90 cents.

Mr. SCHURZ. The next tax is that on tobacco. We have heard from the Senators from the two largest tobacco-growing States an earnest protest against that, and the same reasons which render an increase of the whisky tax objectionable apply to the tobacco tax with similar urgency. Then comes in sugar with an additional duty, which, as I understand from statements read here, will make the duty ad valorem about 80 to 100 per cent. Is not that correct?

Mr. SHERMAN. About 80 per cent.

Mr. SCHURZ. Nobody will deny that a duty as heavy as that will be continually inciting fraud and evasion of the law in a variety of forms. For that reason alone, if for no other, this would be objectionable. Now we come to the main part of the bill, and that is the repeal of the law providing for a reduction of 10 per cent. of our import duties. I already noticed that the only Senator who pronounced himself with any emphasis in favor of the system of taxation embodied in this bill was the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT.] I appreciated his argument, for there never was an occasion for raising the tariff which did not call Pennsylvania to the front. What do we expect from the repeal of the reduction of 10 per cent. of the tariff? The Senator from Vermont tells us that by the increase of import duties here proposed we shall raise a revenue of $6,000,000 a year. But at what price, at what expense to the people will this revenue of six millions be raised?

By this new tariff law, as by every law of that kind, we shall unsettle the industries of the country; we shall disturb values of thousands of millions; we shall put a burden the weight of which you cannot now calculate upon the people; for the people will not only have to pay six millions into the Treasury, but they will have to pay untold millions in addition as a bounty, as a forced tribute to the manufacturers who are favored by the increase of the tariff. A tax indefinite in amount will be raised by this bill, to be paid by the people, not to the Government, but into the pockets of a favored class. If there ever was a time when we should be careful in the enactment of our tax-laws, so as to make necessary burdens weigh lightly upon the people, it is now; and if there ever was a time when an increase of duties should be avoided calculated to enrich the manufacturer at the expense of an already heavily burdened people, that time is now.

Sir, if there is anything necessary for the prosperity of our commerce, it is stability of legislation, or that when a change be made it be for the better. And now we are presenting the extraordinary spectacle to the world of having made two tariff laws at one single session. Sir, this is so barbarous a practice that it can scarcely be believed to have happened in a civilized country; and yet here we have it, two tariff laws in one session, in two months! Nowhere else would such a ruinous absurdity be thought of a single moment, and surely it ought not to be in this enlightened Republic. I was forcibly struck by a phrase used by the Senator from Ohio when he said this bill is brought before us with the cry, "Stand and deliver, or die." Indeed, it looks so. Mr. President, I am by no means unwilling, if the necessities of the Treasury demand it, to impose taxation upon the people; I as every patriotic citizen should be willing to pay his share; but I am not willing to obey the summons "Stand and deliver," when the delivery of the people's money is to be made, less to the Government than to a few protected interests and a limited class of individuals favored by legislation.

We are told, Mr. President, that if by a single amendment to this bill we attempt to avert from the people the imposition of burdens which will not redound to the benefit of the Government, then this bill will fail, and we shall fail in our duty. Is that necessarily so? Is there no possibility, if this bill be amended by the elimination of its most hurtful features, to have a committee of conference between the Senate and the House of Representatives? Is this so entirely out of the reach of possibility? Must we even in this time of distress and embarrassment enact provisions which necessarily increase the evils the people are complaining of? Must we be told, "Take this bill or nothing?" If so, then I shall rather see the Treasury embarrassed than the people outraged with unjust taxes. "Stand and deliver" is a curious method of putting through a bill which by every one of its provisions will most seriously affect the economic movements of the country, and no item of which should be adopted without a careful consideration of the interests to be touched.

No, sir; I do not think it is right and just; I do not think it is worthy of the great law-making power of this Republic that at the end of a session we should be forced to enact such a measure under moral duress, without even an attempt to obliterate those features which, as we all know and admit, will only increase the business embarrassments of the country and by new confusion worse confounded sharpen the sufferings of the people. I repeat, I am ready to satisfy all legitimate demands of the Government in a manner just to the people. But when advantage is taken of such necessities to benefit private interests at the expense of a suffering people, I am not willing to "stand and deliver."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I had not intended to say another word upon this bill; but the Senator from Missouri introduces into this Chamber the old cry that has been heard so long, that whenever a tariff is to be raised Pennsylvaina rushes to the front. Now, Mr. President, figures speak better on that subject than the rhetoric of even the learned and eloquent Senator from Missouri. Take every dutiable article that entered into consumption in the United States in the year 1874, and what was the average rate of duty levied? It was 38.5 per cent. Take the duties upon articles affected by this bill, upon which the Senator says the tariff is raised, those upon which the 10 per cent. reduction took place in 1872, and what are they? Manufactures of cotton, glass, iron and steel, metals, paper, wool, and other articles. The duties levied on cotton and manufactures of cotton are 36 per cent., on glass 46, on iron and steel 31½; here is the scape-goat for all Pennsylvania's protection sins, pig-iron; metals not otherwise provided for, 31; paper 25; wool and manufactures of wool, 54; and other articles 32 per cent. Now, considering that 38.5 per cent. is the average rate of duty upon protected articles that were imported in 1874, we have this scape-goat of Pennsylvania at 31½ per cent., 6½ per cent. below the averege rate of all dutiable articles that enter into consumption in the United States; and what becomes of this cry that it is Pennsylvania that rushes to the front when the tariff is to be raised?

Begin with the Eastern States. Massachusetts and Rhode Island have how much? Thirty-six per cent. on their cotton manufactures. When a tariff is to be raised, does not Connecticut come to the front, too, with percussion-caps and powder-flasks and buttons; and New, York with her butter and cheese, 4 cents a pound upon each of them? New Jersey has her glass, her silk, and her earthenware. Ohio, whose representative sits beside me, [Mr. SHERMAN,] is very sensitive about the duty on flax and linseed oil and oats and wheat and everthing else that is affected—sensitive even about an increase on whisky. And when you go on west to the Senator's own State, it was not simply the clear, ringing cry that comes from pig-iron which can also be produced so abundantly in his own State that was heard, but the heavy thud of the pig-lead of Missouri was heard before the committee in 1872 asking as loudly for the duty on it and on hemp as was Pennsylvania's voice for any of her interests. But the Senator comes to-night repeating this old cry—I was going to say parrot cry, but I will not out of deference to him—that Pennsylvania rushes to the front for protection. You may go all around the Union. Michigan and Wisconsin want protection on lumber; Louisiana wants protection on her sugar; South Carolina wants it and gets it on her rice; Virginia sent up her petition for protection on her sumac; and who are they who do not want protection on their interests? It is American labor everywhere, as it has been often said, that we want to protect, and we shall do it I trust despite all the anathemas of the Senator from Missouri upon Pennsylvania's rushing to the front for protection when it is demanded, and upon protection as a barbaric policy. She is not in the rush alone; she has with her all her sister States upon the articles in which their people are interested; and that is the difficulty we meet when we must have a tax bill. Wherever you touch an interest you will find its representative willing that all other interests but his own shall be taxed. I am not here asking for anything specially for Pennsylvania. This very article of pig-iron upon which denunciation is generally heaped stood at $9; in 1870 it was reduced to $7, and then in 1872, instead of letting it stand with others, you took 10 per cent. off, again reducing it to $6.30, so that now the duty is 31½ per cent., about the lowest rate of duty that is paid by anything, except paper, of the articles that are affected by this 10 per cent. reduction.

I trust, Mr. President, that we shall hear no more of this cry of Pennsylvania being the most selfish of all the States, for if the Senator will take up the interests that center in his own State, the iron interest not the least among them, he will find that Missouri is as near the front and as selfish for her own interests as Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCHURZ. That may be; but I do not think the Senator has seen a representative of Missouri standing up here clamoring for selfish advantages; at least not for a number of years. But I did not want to make an attack upon the Senator from Pennsylvania nor upon the State he represents. I should be glad to please him, and to that end even go so far as to admit that whenever protection comes into question Pennsylvania is the most modest State of all. [Laughter.] The different States and their industrial interests have made their record in our history, and I will leave that record to stand, rash as it is.

But the Senator has said nothing to touch my argument concerning this question in the least. He will no longer pretend, nor will any Senator on this floor, that this is a mere revenue measure. A measure which repeals the reduction of the tariff enacted two or three years ago, thus raising the tariff on articles already protected, is not a mere revenue measure. It is a protection measure in every sense of the term.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator mean by a revenue measure?

Mr. SCHURZ. I mean by a revenue measure this: a measure which imposes a tax, the proceeds of which will, all but the cost of collection, go into the Treasury of the Government, and which will not make the people pay a bounty or tribute to some favored private interest. That is what I call a revenue measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator give an instance of a revenue measure, then?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, sir. I would say a duty on tea and coffee would be a revenue measure. I know very well that a great outcry has been made in this country about "the free breakfast table," that an immense deal of demagogery has been evaporated in that line; but I apprehend by this time the people gradually begin to perceive that the repeal of the duty on tea and coffee, while it deprives the Government of a considerable amount of revenue, did not make tea and coffee cheaper, and that the breakfast table is just as little free as it was before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that show that it was a revenue measure?

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator from Vermont will just permit me to conclude I think I shall furnish him with arguments sufficient. I say the people have become by this time aware that the repeal of the duty on tea and coffee was by no means calculated to make the breakfast table freer than it had been before; for not only did that repeal leave the price of tea and coffee as high as before, but it served also as a pretext for maintaining the onerous duties on almost every other article that constitutes the breakfast table. I do think that a duty upon tea and coffee would have the great merit of being a revenue measure. I do think that such a duty would be a very easy one to collect. I do think that every cent of it, deducting the mere expenses of collection, would flow into the Treasury of the United States. I do think therefore that it would accomplish the purposes of this bill if they are legitimately designated as revenue purposes far better than any provision here devised. Therefore I am in favor of such a provision in preference to others, ready as I am to brave the deceptive cry that has been raised about "the free breakfast table."

It seems to me the people of the United States are becoming gradually enlightened upon this as well as many other similar subjects. I remember the day when we were told that, because our flag was disappearing from the ocean, because our maritime commerce was languishing and an enormous proportion of our trade carried on in foreign bottoms, every patriot must vote for steamship subsidies. We have got over that now, and the people will soon remember this very simple principle: that as long as we have a tariff that makes it impossible for us to build ships as cheaply and to run them as economically as other nations, and as long as we have navigation laws forbidding us to buy ships where we can get them as cheap as other nations get them, just so long it will be impossible for us to carry on our maritime trade in successful competition with other nations; and you may swamp the Treasury of the United States with subsidies, and nevertheless your maritime commerce will not flourish. The people of the United States are beginning to see this, and I hope they will act up to it. Just so they are beginning to see that the repeal of the duty on tea and coffee did after all not benefit the poor people, as it was once so vociferously pretended, and I think they will be, if they are not now, at least very soon ready to accept again the restoration of that duty.

Mr. SCOTT. Having taken somewhat of an active part in endeavoring to induce the Senate to take off the duties on tea and coffee, of course I must acknowledge that no other Senator here than the Senator from Missouri has the courage to resist the demagogery of that action. Nevertheless I shall be willing here to meet all the imputation of demagogery which comes from preferring to put a tax upon whisky rather than upon tea and coffee.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Pennsylvania will of course understand me as not having alluded to him nor to any Senator on this floor when I said that. I alluded more to what I have heard in public meetings and the like and seen in the public papers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] charges me with having admitted that this bill is very imperfect, and he says that no Senator will claim that it is a revenue measure. Now, Mr. President, I claimed in my opening remarks, and I still claim, that it is nothing but a revenue measure. There is not a single tax proposed here that is asked for in the way of protection; there is only a proposition made to increase the tax upon articles on which we now levy duties. But I should not expect to find a tax bill here or a bill imposing duties upon foreign imports that would receive the approbation of the Senator from Missouri. I know that home protection is the black beast that always excites his hostility. But he must bear this in mind, that we have a large revenue to collect in order to meet the interest of the public debt and the ordinary public expenditures, and that the duties will be incidentally protective in their effects to more or less extent. That we cannot help if we would, and would not if we could. I am quite sure that the premier of England would be entirely satisfied with any tariff that would suit the Senator from Missouri. He could not have here a more efficient advocate of the interests of Great Britian than the Senator from Missouri. He would say, buy always where we can buy cheapest. But still we have to impose taxes upon our people. We cannot manufacture merchandise of various kinds or ships at the same rate that they might be purchased where labor is less appreciated than it is here, and therefore we should have to go abroad for all or nearly all that we should consume; and that would suit British interests, and I am frank to say that I believe from the sentiments avowed by the Senator from Missouri would best suit him.

But, Mr. President, there was one fact stated by the Senator from Missouri, and partially assented to by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that I must controvert and rebut; and that is, if we impose these increased duties upon sugars we raise the duty up to 80, 90, or 100 per cent. That is an utter fallacy, and, as I understand it, wholly without foundation. Look at the present prices of sugars. You find to-day that sugars clayed, No. 12, bring in our market 8¼ cents per pound. They are only taxed 2¼ cents per pound, or about 25 per cent. of the home valuation. Is that 80 or 90 per cent.? Of course the grocer's profit made on sugars is generally not over a quarter or a half cent per pound. When you come to the lower grades, you find that the prices of the lower grades of sugar are utterly inconsistent with any idea that they have paid a duty of 80 or 90 per cent. It is an absurdity to suppose any such thing. It may be possible that on some very inferior quality, tank-bottom sugar or low grade, dirty sugars, such as are sometimes brought from India, where there is scarcely perhaps a difference between such sugars and melada, they may pay a higher rate; but the ordinary rate of duties imposed by the present tariff on common sugars is not over somewhere about 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything more upon this bill; but I do not like to have it supposed that I would foist a bill upon the Senate without having the Senate fully understand its merits as well as its demerits. I have therefore conceded that this was not such a bill as would suit me, not such a bill as I would be glad to support. I would be perfectly willing to put a duty on tea and coffee, but our committee-room has been crammed with memorials against any duty on tea and coffee. The Committee on Finance have received a larger number of memorials against that duty than upon all other subjects together save one, perhaps, and that is in favor of imposing this 10 per cent. duty upon the articles enumerated in the section described in this bill.

Now, Mr. President, I close as I began; this is merely a revenue measure. It is wanted for that purpose and for no other. It will accomplish the object, and without it it is quite apparent that the Government will not be able to conduct the business of the country with decency and honor, as it has done in past years. Besides that let me say one thing more. The Senator from Missouri has rung the changes upon a phrase used by somebody—I do not know by whom—that this is a bill that we must pass on the "stand and deliver" principle.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was Falstaff who began that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Now, Mr. President, is it not well understood that we are in the last expiring moments of the session and that any bill that goes back to the House of Representatives has a small chance of any consideration. This bill was passed there by a very small majority, and if sent back it could not be taken up and considered if objected to by a single individual, unless there were a two-thirds majority in favor of taking it up. I think any prudent Senator will consider the circumstances which surround him and see whether it is practicable or not to pass the bill. Therefore this idea of "stand and deliver" has no terrors for me. I look at the naked facts as I find them, and I find it is impossible, in the judgment of wiser men than myself, to obtain a consideration for any amendment whatever. Therefore I exhort the friends of the bill, if it has any, to stand by it as it came from the House.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to make reply to but one remark of the Senator from Vermont. He has brought out once more the old cry of "British free-trade," charging that those who are opposed to a protective tariff must necessarily desire to serve Great Britain at the expense of this country. The Senator from Vermont is a sensible man, and I am somewhat painfully surprised to hear from him such language. I think he keeps the run of the literature of the times. He must know, therefore, that that cry of serving Great Britian has become a little stale, pitiably so, and fails of effect. Even the young men of the country who have begun to take an interest in political economy and think for themselves begin to laugh at it, not to speak of the older heads, who have laughed at it a long time already.

I think, therefore, I can dismiss the Senator's allusion as not deserving of serious notice, with due respect to him.

The Senator insists that he has said this was a strictly revenue measure. So he has, but with his kind permission, his saying so does not make it so. I think the repeal of the reduction of 10 per cent. of the tariff cannot be looked upon as a strictly revenue measure by any sensible man; for as the Senator from Ohio showed in language clear and eloquent, the raising of the tariff will necessarily raise the prices of the articles protected, and therefore take money out of the pockets of the people who have to buy, and that money does not go into the Treasury of the United States, but does go into the pockets of favorite manufacturers. Therefore, although the Senator from Vermont may have designed it to be a revenue measure, and declared it to be such, it nevertheless is just the reverse; and I insist upon the justice of my protest against a measure, which, while the industries of the country are languishing, the people are in distress, and the most careful legislation is called for, takes advantage of pretended necessities of the Treasury to impose taxes upon the people which will yield a small revenue to the Government, and at the same time extort untold millions from the people to put them into the pockets of favored individuals.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it was objected to this bill that it was unequal in that it taxed the stock of tobacco on hand and did not tax the whisky in stock. I do not think the bill subject to that criticism. Tobacco and whisky dealers have ordinary intelligence. They know that the tax will never be lower than it is now. They have seen for some time the possibility of its being made on whisky 90 instead of 70 cents a gallon, and the probability of that tax being increased on tobacco; and it is a fair conclusion that they have for the most part paid the tax at the rate which they know is the minimum rather than run the risk of increased taxation. As to the appreciation in price growing out of this legislation, it is clear that operates equally on the tobacco and on the whisky interests.

One word more. Congress has this session passed a financial measure which promises to redeem in silver the fractional currency and to redeem the greenbacks in 1879. It is a strange comment on that action, which met the approval of the whole country at the beginning of this session, that at the close of the session we refuse to adopt a bill that is necessary to prevent a deficiency of thirty-five millions in the Treasury. How are we to substitute a silver for a paper fractional currency; how can we make any progress toward carrying into effect that financial bill if we not only make no provision for that purpose but retrograde, and actually suffer the faith of this country to be violated in reference to maintaining the sinking fund?

Mr. President, again it has been said that this is an oppressive tax. I would say to the Senator from Missouri, who seems to be so afraid that by restoring the 10 per cent. on foreign imports untold millions will pour into the pockets of the manufacturers of the country, that their mills are idle, their looms have stopped, thousands and hundreds of thousands of industrious men and their families are to-day suffering for want of employment, and this provision, which will give an additional 10 per cent. to the revenue, will have great effect in reviving our slumbering industries. It may be that it is a sign of barbarism for this country to protect its home industries; it may be, as the Senator says, that no civilized country would so legislate; but the people of this country do not believe it. They believe that the man who does not provide for his own is worse than an infidel. Our people believe that taking off protection from the manufactures and products of this country is giving protection to England's manufactures and against those of this country so long as the prices of labor in England and in this country bear the relation to each other that they now do.

Another argument advanced is that this bill provides for a partial and unequal taxation because tobacco is raised and whisky distilled at the West. Why, sir, it is not those who raise the tobacco or manufacture the whisky that pay the tax. The tax will not even diminish the demand. People will have tobacco and whisky whether it is one price or another within certain limits. Those articles will command when the tax is raised an increased price. It is the consumers of whisky and tobacco that pay the tax, and they are as numerous in the East as they are in the West.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Vermont would lead the Senate, I fear, to think that I have misled them in regard to the present duty on sugar. I did not know when I read Grinnell, Minturn & Co.'s letter whether they were accurate or not; indeed, I did not state the present rate of duty, but simply read their letter in which they said that on some of the grades of sugar the rate of duty by this bill would be from 80 to 100 per cent. I have turned to the tables to find what is the present rate of duty. I find, by taking the last returns, that during the year 1874 the amount of brown sugar brought into this country was 1,592,000,000 pounds, and the custom-house valuation of that sugar was $77,440,000, or a trifle over 5 cents a pound. That includes all grades. The present tax on sugar is from 1¼ cents a pound up to about 3¼. I rather think, as near as I can recollect, that the average is about 2¼ cents; but perhaps I am a little over the amount. My friend from Vermont will know.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The great bulk of our sugars which are imported is of the lower grades that pay but 1¼ cents a pound, and from that up to No. 13, which includes a very fair article, is at 2¼. When they become refined it is higher than that, and up to No. 16 they pay a higher rate, and so up to 3 cents a pound, which is the highest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then according to the tables the present duty on sugar is from 40 to 50 per cent., depending upon the grade; but adding to it 25 per cent., you make it from 50 to 60 per cent. on brown sugar, and on molasses and melada and the other cheaper grades it would be higher, as the Senator says. So that if there is any mistake made by the firm whose letter I read, it ought to be modified to that extent. The present duty is between 40 and 50 per cent. The increased duty would be between 50 and 60 per cent.—about 60.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not think it is so high as that; but that is from different statements from 80, 90, or 100 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I had intended to content myself with the mere question I asked the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] in regard to giving an explanation of the reason why a distinction should be made between the tax on tobacco and whisky; and from the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, I supposed the Senator from New Jersey referred to the point that was made in reference to that question. I do not wish to embarrass the Senate or any one here, or embarrass this bill by my opposition to it; nor would I say a word had it not been for the allusion of the Senator to that proposition. Now, I do not know that I shall be able to make myself understood; but if I shall be, I can satisfy the Senate that my proposition in reference to this bill is correct, and then it is for the Senator or those who advocate the bill in its present shape to make an explanation to their own satisfaction. So far as the proposition in the tariff part of the bill is concerned, I have nothing to say. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in discussing it. If the fourth section of this bill, which is the section that increases the rates of duty 10 per cent., were separate from the bill, that would be one thing; but inasmuch as it is connected with the bill, it is certainly not fair to attempt to carry that with an improper bill because of the tax levied upon whisky and tobacco; nor is it proper to attempt to carry the tax on whisky and tobacco if the 10 per cent. increase of duties be not correct. I should be glad to see, as my friend from New Jersey said in reference to the manufacturers of this country—and he always speaks eloquently—the fires lighted in the furnaces all over this land. I should be glad to hear the noise of the trip-hammer sounding in all parts of this country. I would be glad to see coal mines opened; our iron mines opened; our silver mines, our gold mines working, and every business in this country that is calculated to produce wealth in a prosperous condition. There is no one who would go further than I would for that purpose if a bill to reach it was placed in a proper way before the Senate. I should be glad to know, as my friend suggested, what we are to do in reference to carrying out the provisions of a bill that we passed in the early part of the session in reference to specie payments. Unless we pass this bill, he says, we shall have done nothing in that direction.

Allow me to call the attention of my friend from New Jersey to one fact. We did pass a bill in which we required some forty-six millions of fractional silver pieces to be coined, and I introduced a bill one year ago for the establishment of a mint. The report of the Director of all the mints of this country has satisfied the Senate and the House that we have not facilities to coin the money needed; and that is one of the reasons why the bullion leaves our country. That bill has slumbered for one year in a committee of this Senate Chamber, and only saw light two days ago, and then the report was to refer it to the President of the United States to ascertain where a mint ought to be established, to report at the next session of Congress for our action. Sir, when you talk about having done nothing for the purpose of producing coin in this country, I say it is not my fault that it has not been done. Whose fault it is I will not say; but why did you not pass a bill establishing a mint somewhere and let our bullion be coined in this land. But the statesmen of to-day are so much alarmed by the displeasure that they might probably incur because of selecting one place over another that they refer it to the President that he may take the responsibility of selecting a place where a mint shall be established instead of Congress doing it, the power that ought to do it. There is one thing you ought to have done that has not been done; but is that a reason why we should do something else that is wrong, because it is near the close of the session and we are here to-night to pass this bill? Why? I will not allude to the other House; but we have passed months and no bill has been proposed for taxation until within the last days, and then the bill was proposed in this shape in order to pass it through under the gag, in order to force men to vote for it whether they thought it was right or not. As far as I am concerned, I vote for a measure when I think it is right, if it is on the last day of the session; and if I think it is wrong, I will not vote for it.

I wish to refer now to the remarks of the Senator in reference to the tax on whisky and tobacco. I think whisky and tobacco ought to pay a tax. I do not care how high they are taxed, provided the tax can be collected, provided that tax is levied fairly on both of these productions; but we all know that at the time the tax on whisky was highest we collected the smallest amount of revenue from that production. It has been demonstrated in this country that when you levy a high tax on whisky it cannot and will not be collected. I know that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommended 10 cents increase in the tax on whisky. This bill increases it 20 cents on the gallon. Why? He thought 10 cents was enough; you think it will require 20. You appeal to us and say these officers are the judges of what we need, but when they make a recommendation you pay no attention to it and take your own judgment. Although I have been told by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he can collect 90 cents on whisky, and I have no doubt he thinks so, I do not believe it, and I do not believe it because heretofore we have failed to collect the tax when we had a high rate on whisky. It is an inducement to fraud, and frauds will be perpetrated whenever the opportunity is offered, as every one knows. When we reduced the whisky tax to 50 cents, we collected much more than when it was at $2 a gallon. Will men tell me to-night that the higher the tax on whisky is the more you will collect, when the evidence before you shows that the higher it is the less you collect? But that is not the point. There are millions of gallons of whisky in this country already in the hands of distillers and dealers. You increase the tax on whisky 20 cents, and you say to these gentlemen who hold it, "You may make that 20 cents on all you hold, and we will take the 20 cents on that which is produced hereafter."

Are you afraid to tax whisky on hand? Is that the reason? I do not ask that it shall be taxed. I do not advocate any such thing; but when you tax tobacco and whisky, when you put them on the same foundation, I ask that you should put them on the same level so far as the collecting of the tax is concerned. Here you give to the man who holds the whisky the 20 cents; and is there any man in the Senate Chamber so ignorant as not to know that the very moment this bill passes the price of whisky will increase 20 cents a gallon, and that 20 cents goes into the pocket of whom? The man who holds the whisky, not into the Government's vaults, not where you want your revenue, but into his pocket. I have seen speculations of that kind before, or at least I have heard of them. Then you turn right over to tobacco, and there you tax the tobacco on hand, not the tobacco that shall be produced hereafter, but the tobacco on hand. You tax the whisky that shall be produced hereafter and exempt the whisky on hand. I ask any man to tell me whether this is fair action, fair legislation or not. If you tax tobacco on hand, you ought to tax whisky on hand; and if you exempt whisky on hand, you ought to exempt tobacco on hand. I do not say that I am in favor of taxing whisky on hand, but I am as much in favor of taxing whisky on hand as I am in favor of taxing tobacco on hand. They are the two productions that you say will bear taxation. If so, tax them equally, tax them alike; give the same advantage to the producer of one that you do to the producer of the other. I state to-day that I represent a people who produce great quantities of whisky, and a people also that produce a great deal of tobacco. In the southern part of the State that I partly represent on this floor the people produce a great deal of tobacco. In other parts of the State we produce a great deal of whisky. You then give to one part of my State the right to hold the whisky and make 20 cents a gallon on it; the other part of the State you deprive of the right to hold it, but tax them on that which is on hand. That is my objection to this bill. It is not fair; it is not just. The bill that came before the House first had a provision in it for the taxing of whisky on hand, but there was force enough to induce the House to strike that out, and not enough force to strike out tobacco on hand. You say to me we must not talk about amending this bill in the Senate; if amended, it cannot get through. What has that to do with legislation? The right way is to legislate right, and not legislate wrong for fear you will have no action. Now, then, strike out tobacco in hand and you will have them on an equality. Exempt them both from taxation, so far as that is concerned, if you exempt one.

I should not have said so much had it not been that there seems to me an attempt here to force men to vote for a measure that they are opposed to; and we are told the Government will almost be destroyed if we do not. We are told that the Government cannot run unless it has this money; that there will be a great deficiency. Well, it will cost the Government no more to vote the deficiency than it costs the Government now to tax the people. I ask you, Senators, to-night, when you return to your homes and meet the people, and when they ask you what have you done, what will you say? "Nothing, except at the last hour of the session we taxed you $40,000,000 more." That will be pleasant; they will like that! It will sound well! Now what are you going to do? The other night when this measure was up I opposed an adjournment until we could decide it, so that it might go back to the House if it were amended; but our friends here were all in favor of an adjournment, and so you lost a whole night. Now we are to be told that we have no time to arrange or make this bill better or perfect it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan I hope the Senator will remember that those who are opposed to this bill were in favor of an adjournment. The expression of the Senator was very sweeping that all were in favor of an adjournment.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator need not have put himself to that much trouble. I am not in favor of this bill, and I opposed an adjournment and stood up in my place and begged the Senate not to adjourn. I speak for myself. I have stood here day after day and asked that a little bill be passed to equalize the bounties of the soldiers of this country, but that cannot be done. Why? It will take money out of the Treasury! Now, if you are determined to pass this tax bill, what do you want the bill for if you do not expend the money for something? Am I to be told every day that the equalization of bounties cannot be passed in this Senate because it will take money out of the Treasury, and in the very next breath I am to be asked to vote $40,000,000 of taxes? Are we to be told that we cannot go on with the public works because they will take money out of the Treasury and the next moment asked to vote taxes on the people? What do you want with the taxes if it is not for the purpose of expending them? We are told to-night very eloquently by the Senator from Indiana that unless we pass the bill we shall see our public buildings stopped; that we shall see the public works stopped. This is all very well to talk for the purpose of scaring people; it does well enough to talk that kind of talk to people that will scare, but it is unnecessary to talk it to men who can understand questions as well as those who use that kind of talk to frighten people. I have no fears of the public buildings stopping; and if some of them were stopped I do not know but what it would be tolerably well for the country.

I think the best way for us to do is to bring our appropriations within our means, and not try to bring taxation up to our appropriations. If we have not got money enough to make lavish appropriations, let us measure our appropriations by our means. In that way the Government will run. If we are paying two or three million dollars for a piece of work of which one-half is mere ornament, cut off the ornamentation and have your work substantial. Let that be our motto and there will be no trouble. Many of my friends have come to me and said, "We do not want you to vote against this bill." I do not want to vote against it if I can see a reason why I should vote for it, but I do not see that reason; it has not been given to me yet, and hence I shall not do it.

I have been asked time and time again why I insisted that this Government should run in the hands in which it has been. For years and years the Government has gone on; we have reduced taxation every year and paid a part of the public debt every year. Now, rather than tax the people further at this time, I would say pay your interest on your public debt and let the principal stand for a time. It is not increasing while you pay the interest. I would let it remain for awhile, for one year or for two years—the principal of the public debt—and keep the interest paid, rather than insist upon retaxing the people of this country.

This much I have been forced to say, for I sit here perhaps almost alone on my side of the House; at least only one Senator has said a word against the bill except myself on the side that I claim to belong to politically. We may perhaps be solitary and alone on our side in our votes. Hence I have been forced to say what I have said in justification of the vote which I intend to give on this bill, and not because I had any desire to make any remarks.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I look with some apprehension on the prospect that the bill before the Senate may be beaten. I do not certainly think this will be the case; but the indications which we have had to-day and to-night lead me to believe that the bill cannot succeed in its present form. I look upon this as a misfortune to the Treasury and to the country; but I desire to say, and to ask the Senate to stand by me in the position that I shall be compelled to take with reference to such appropriation bills as are within reach, that everything in the nature of a discretionary item shall be dropped from those bills. Senators have sent to the Committee on Appropriations upon the sundry civil bill, which, as we all know, is a kind of catch-all for items not considered upon all other bills, many amendments, I suppose all important to them. If it is not possible for this tax bill to pass or some tax bill to pass Congress, it will be very necessary to economize with great severity, and I shall consider it my duty and shall expect Senators around me who do not see their way clear to pass a tax bill to stand by me if I come in reporting against their favorite amendments or even cutting down the bill as it may come from the House by eliminating all items that can possibly be spared without great injury to the public service.

Furthermore it seems to me that if this bill or some bill raising revenue cannot pass both Houses, it would be idle, it would be worse than idle for us to pass the river and harbor bill. That is a branch of the public service which, with here and there an occasional loss to works which are in progress, can be spared and must be spared rather than that the national credit should be injured and the national debt increased.

This is all I wish to say upon this bill; I do not wish to delay a vote; but I understand that in the opinion of Senators who are peculiarly favorable to the bill the pending motion is considered as a test-vote upon the bill. I trust we may come to that vote. If the bill is certainly beaten, let it be done soon. There is no use remaining here all night to discuss it.

Mr. ALCORN. I trust, Mr. President, I shall not be found wanting at any time in giving support to a measure necessary to the support of the Government and to liquidate promptly all its obligations; but I submit to the Senate that this bill which is now under consideration is a little out of place, and I propose to give the reasons why I shall vote against it if the vote is now pressed. Selfishness is a part of human nature which belongs to us all. It was given us for a valuable purpose, and it is the duty of each Senator upon this floor and each Representative in the Congress of the United States to see to it that those whom he represents shall be dealt fairly with in all the appropriations that are made by the Government. The State that I in part represent, with its broad sea-coast, with its almost incomparable harbors on the Gulf coast, has not, since the war began, ever received a notice from the Congress of the United States. Look, sir, at the river and harbor bill. The State of Mississippi has just $10,000 embraced in all its appropriations, and that $10,000, I am sorry to say, is exactly where it is not needed. I propose to see what you will do with the river and harbor bill before I give my vote for the money necessary to support the schemes that are now in the imagination of Senators on this floor. Take up and pass the river and harbor bill, and then when you have laid out your work, knowing the amount of money that is necessary to meet the demand, the Senate owes it to itself, the Congress owes it to itself, to comply with the demands it will have made upon the Treasury. But until those demands are drawn up in the form of legislation, I submit that to be legislating here in the way of raising $40,000,000 is legislating without sufficient data to base that legislation upon. Give us to understand by your legislation what you propose to do with the river and harbor bill; give me to know whether I am justified in taxing the poor laborer in the State from which I come in his tobacco, in his whisky, and 10 per cent. upon his apparel by reason of the appropriations that are made under the river and harbor bill, the sundry civil bill, and under the various other bills that are not yet acted upon.

The Senator from New Jersey I think put this bill upon its true basis. It is the consumer that pays this tax; it is the consumer everywhere. The consumer in the State that I in part represent pays the tax, and I am opposed to his paying it unless there is some remuneration for it. I do not understand that this $40,000,000 is necessary to support the Government unless the legislation of Congress shall make the demands upon the Treasury that are anticipated. If we stop short just here the forty millions are not necessary. The honorable Senator said that there were now amendments pending on the river and harbor bill amounting to ten or eleven million dollars. That is true; and we are asked to go forward on the idea that it is necessary to pass this bill that we may meet the demands of those amendments. Take up the river and harbor bill, and let us see how that is. If it be needed, I stand prepared to vote for it. If it be not needed, I stand prepared to vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not like this bill in many respects, but I believe that if the bill fails some of the measures suggested by the Senator from Mississippi will fail with it, and I believe the river and harbor bill will fail with it. Although I do not believe it ought to fail, even if this bill does not pass, yet from what had been said during this debate I am satisfied such will be the result. I believe that the river and harbor bill is the last one that should fail, even if this tax bill is not passed; but I know very well that the feeling has been for years, and I believe it is now, that the river and harbor bill can be laid aside better than any other; in other words, that the commerce of the country may be neglected and that the burdens which are now borne by it may not be cared for while all other appropriations are made. Believing that that feeling exists, and that that bill and certain amendments which I want to offer to it will fail, I shall vote for this bill on its passage to-night; and I trust to the good judgment of the Senate, if this law shall pass, to use a portion of the funds which we shall raise for the purpose of reducing the burdens of taxation in other directions. In my State and in several others of the Northwestern States, and I believe also in the Southern States, the burdens borne by the people in the interchange of their products are heavier than any other burdens which they bear to-day. I believe that an appropriation of a small amount of money will inaugurate a system which will relieve those burdens. I do not believe that system will be inaugurated, because I do not believe the Senate will agree to it if this bill should fail, and therefore while I do not in many respects like this bill I shall give it my support.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I do not propose to say anything on the subject of the bill. I shall vote against this amendment, however, and shall vote against the bill; but I think if the bill is to be passed at all, if we are to pass any bill, we should pass this bill as it is. I shall vote against all amendments to the bill, preferring to leave it just as it is and take the vote squarely upon the bill as it came from the House. I shall therefore vote against the amendment, and all amendments, and shall vote against the bill on its final passage. I say this lest my vote against the amendment might be misconstrued. I vote against it, as I shall against all other amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COOPER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I would vote "yea."

Mr. SCHURZ, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I would vote "yea."

Mr. HARVEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.] He would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Ogelsby, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Carpenter, Conkling, Cooper, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Lewis, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, Sprague, Wadleigh, and West—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to strike out the first and second sections of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert—

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles herein mentioned the rates of duty herein prescribed, namely: On tea 10 cents per pound; on coffee 2 cents per pound.

The rates of duty named upon tea and coffee are those which prevailed at the time the tax upon them was repealed. The vote which has just been taken is admitted on both sides of the Chamber to have been a test vote, except that it was said the bill was two or three votes less strong than the amendment; that is to say, there would be less votes for the bill than there were against the amendment. That being so, desirous to save the tax bill and desirous to test the theories of some of our friends who now hear me and who have spoken heretofore, I propose this amendment. This certainly is a simple revenue amendment, and Senators cannot object to it on any ground of their opposition to protection, or any other theory whatever, except that they do not desire to raise the additional revenue for the Government. I do not desire to debate the question pro or con, for the propriety of taxing tea and coffee is very well understood. It is well understood that coffee and tea are not 1 cent cheaper since the repeal of the tax; that the countries from which we import these articles put on an export duty; and unquestionably that duty will be repealed upon our putting a tax on these articles. I offer the amendment; I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate in discussing it.

Mr. CLAYTON. After what has been said by the Senator from California as to the vote which has just been taken being a test vote, I desire to say that so far as I am concerned it is not a test vote. If the bill is perfected as I think it should be, I shall vote for it, but I cannot, representing the constituency I represent, discriminate as between the production and manufacture of tobacco and of whisky. I desired by my vote to place the manufacturer of tobacco at least on an equality with the manufacturer of whisky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I have listened to the result of the vote just taken with great regret. I think this bill is necessary to the restoration, prosperity, business, comfort, and happiness all over the country, and I am surprised to find that a bill so necessary to the prosperity of the country should be defeated by the unanimous votes of all the Democrats in the Senate and of the weak-kneed Republicans.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. What does the Senator say?

Mr. CAMERON. I say by the weak-kneed Republicans. I mean no individuals, but I mean Senators who are more anxious about what they suppose to be their own popularity than the success of the country; and I say to them that in my long life I have never seen any man who made any profit to himself from cowardice and from selfishness. This bill is necessary to preserve the integrity of the country, the character of the country, and the prosperity of the people of the country. It would bring no additional taxation to anybody. It would bring revenue into the Treasury without bringing discomfort to any individual. We have lost the bill by the want of faith on the part of the Republicans. They will find out what they will make by it, for my experience is that no men who leave their friends, either in public or private life, ever make any profit by it. I do not believe this question is going to destroy the Republican party, because I am satisfied that the intelligence of the country will see that it was the Democratic party which, if the country is disgraced, has disgraced it.

I have listened to all these discussions, proposing not to say a word; and I only say the few words I am now saying for the purpose of showing to my own people that I do not approve of the result. You talk about making an amendment to the bill. No amendment will do any good. If the bill is changed to-night by a single amendment, it goes back to the other House and is defeated. I am especially pained that my friend, the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. SHERMAN,] should oppose this bill. I ought to have thought the other day, when he refused to pass a bill giving $1,600 for head-stones to one hundred and sixty soldiers——

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not hear him.

Mr. CAMERON. I say I ought to have known the other day, when the chairman of the Committee on Finance refused to consent to the passage of a bill to put head-stones to the graves of one hundred and sixty dead soldiers, that he would go against any question which the country might need in its great distress. [Laughter.] I do not mean any disrespect to him. I have voted very often to do honor, and I am going to vote again directly to do honor to some of his family, and I am sorry indeed that he now, who ought to be the first person to see that the Treasury is made able to take care of itself, is the first one to prevent money from going into the Treasury for its support.

Mr. President, I only want the country to know how this bill has been defeated; how the country will be prevented from keeping its honor and its integrity next year. It will not be by the republican party, but it will be by the combined efforts of the opposition to the republican party and a few individual Senators who have believed that their own constituents would be injured to the extent of a few dollars by the passage of this bill. Ohio makes a great deal of whisky, and why should not whisky pay a tax? Is it not better that that should pay a tax than tea and coffee? The Senator would tax the poor man, the poor woman, and the poor child, whose only luxuries are tea and coffee, and yet he refuses to prevent the great distilleries of his State from paying a cent or two more of tax upon their whisky or their tobacco. I believe I shall vote for his amendment to tax tea and coffee; but it is wrong, and I am not certain that I shall vote for it. I will not decide that until the time approaches to vote upon it. That is all I intend to say about it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, because the Senate a moment ago thought proper to put an amendment on this bill, equalizing the articles, putting tobacco on the same footing with whisky, the honorable Senator from California has seen proper to offer an amendment striking out both those sections proposing the increased tax on whisky and tobacco and proposing in lieu of them a tax on tea and coffee. I have always thought that tea and coffee, whisky and tobacco were proper subjects for taxation. All these four articles are alike certain subjects of taxation. I have always hitherto voted for a tax on tea and coffee, and would vote for it upon this occasion were it offered as an amendment to the fourth section of this bill, but as an amendment striking out the first and second sections of this bill, I cannot vote for it.

The fourth section provides for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of the tariff that took place in 1872. I am perfectly willing to strike out the fourth section and substitute for it the amendment of the Senator from California, because we will then have an equivalent; a general reduction upon all the necessities of life alike will then be made; and while doing that, we will derive a revenue from the articles still remaining taxed under the fourth section of that bill, and we will in addition have a revenue derived from tea and coffee.

But, Mr. President, while thus stating what I am perfectly willing to do in regard to the fourth section of this bill in order that the tariff duties may remain generally as they do now, I must be sufficiently candid to say that I shall vote for no tax bill at this session of Congress; I shall vote for no taxation at all, and it is simply for the best possible reason to myself that there should be a little press in the country in order that we may know what we ought to spend.

We have been spending too much money, and unless we are somewhat crippled in our resources we will not come to a proper understanding of our condition. I do not fear the credit of the country. Our revenues are sufficiently large to carry on the Government in all its departments and besides pay the interest on the public debt and have a fair sum appropriated toward its extinguishment. All we want is a prudent economy in this body and in the other branch of Congress, a curtailment of unnecessary expenditures, a considerable diminution of our great ideas of what this country ought to be now, when it is barely in its infancy and with a depression of the material interests of our people. I am sure that we will come back to where we ought to be in the expenditure of our money.

Now just for illustration, my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who just chided the Senator from Ohio for refusing to vote with him on some project that he had before the Senate for tombstones at graves of soldiers at Harrisburgh, but the other day got an appropriation to purchase a lot of ground in Harrisburgh, that is to cost, for the lot alone, remember, in a small town comparatively like Harrisburgh, $116,000, upon which to put a building. Now I do not object. I want my honorable friend to understand that I do not object.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. The tombstones are not for Harrisburgh, but for the town of York.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am not talking about that.

Mr. CAMERON. One half of the dead buried there were rebels who died there and were cared for and buried by the charitable people of that town.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I have no question about that; but it is not proposed to put tombstones to their graves, I understand.

Mr. CAMERON. Tombstones for all of them, without respect to States. They are from sixteen States, for those from the southern States as well as from the Northern States.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am not speaking about that. I am drawing the attention of the Senate to these extraordinary expenditures of public money. I am sure I have no objection to the expenditure of money there any more than at any other place in the country; but when we look at the amount of money that is alone expended upon your public buildings it is simply monstrous.

While that expenditure was under consideration the other day, I just happened to turn to the list of public buildings now in the course of construction in the United States, and they must be in the most extravagant style. I find the estimated appropriations for the coming year to be $8,000,000, reduced, to be sure, by the Committee on Ways and Means in the House to between five and six million dollars, or probably rising six million dollars. Still it is an extravagant sum of money to be appropriated for such purposes.

Look at some of these buildings. There is the post-office at Boston. That is a great center of trade, I acknowledge. The appropriation for that was made in 1868 and 1871. Then we were in trouble; we had a large public debt; we had had taxation everywhere, and yet we expended upon that $2,000,000, or upward. The custom-house at Chicago just begun the other day: the site was purchased in 1872. I want my honorable friend from Illinois to understand that I do not object to his getting a fair share of the public money in this way when it is going around, but I do object to the thing in itself, that this is not a proper time, when we have $2,000,000,000 of indebtedness and such an enormous taxation upon us. The site alone for the Chicago post-office cost $1,256,000; and that was just two years ago. The expenditures upon it so far, toward the building, have been about $200,000. If the site of such a building cost $1,200,000, what are we to expect when we put the superstructure upon it? What can we expect?

So I might go on with numerous instances of the kind. Here is my friend from California, [Mr. SARGENT.] The building in San Francisco was commenced in 1867, and it has cost $1,898,000 so far.

Mr. SARGENT. What building?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The custom-house in San Francisco.

Mr. SARGENT. They are not building a custom-house.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The post-office, perhaps?

Mr. SARGENT. They are not building a post-office.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. What are you building in San Francisco?

Mr. SARGENT. I am sorry to say my friend is entirely mistaken. They did build a mint; and finished it some time ago.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not care what the building was, the amount appropriated was $1,898,000 when the country was involved in this debt. I am talking about the expenditure of public money when you are in debt.

Here is the court-house at Springfield, Illinois. Upon that, and because of that, my honorable friend from Pennsylvania got his appropriation for the Harrisburgh court-house. That court-house, which was commenced in 1872, has cost already $295,000. I do not object to it if we have plenty of money and are out of debt, but that is a large amount to appropriate for a court-house in Springfield.

Mr. LOGAN. The court-house there is not finished.

Mr. THURMAN. And we appropriated $18,000 for furniture.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Look at another court-house, in Utica, New York, begun in 1874. The site for that court-house in Utica, New York, has cost $161,000. What do you think of it? And that was last year. So I could go on through with this list and show these enormous expenditures of money.

Mr. LOGAN. Go on to some of the expenses incurred for Baltimore.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am not talking about expenditures before the war. I am referring to those since the war. Take the New York custom-house——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Has the Senator got the amount that is proposed to be appropriated for Baltimore after the Appropriation Committee were sent over there to examine the site of the place?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I have not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Four million dollars, was it not?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If Baltimore stands in need of a court-house or custom-house, build one according to your means and that will answer the purpose. With due submission to the honorable Senator from Vermont, these expenditures of public money when our people are oppressed with debt is scandalous in my judgment. Now look at New York. Here is the post-office for New York.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him once more? I do it with great reluctance, because he is always so kind.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. I want to ask the Senator from Maryland if he remembers how much money there is asked of Congress here now in a bill pending, and I think under his protection, for guns furnished the Government when it was in its greatest need in 1861? Certain guns were used to protect the State of Maryland by the Government of the United States, and just now, when he says we should not be in a liberal mood, the Senator himself, I think, brings in a bill and asks us to pay four or five hundred thousand dollars for old and worthless muskets.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. When was that bill introduced? I never heard of it.

Mr. CAMERON. Very recently.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If I understand it, there is a bill to pay the State of Maryland for arms delivered to the United States when they wanted arms, amounting to $64,000. If that is the bill to which the Senator refers, and if it be wrong, do not pay it; but pay your debts. I am saying nothing now against the payment of debts, but I am talking against these extravagant expenditures of money for other purposes than the payment of debts.

Mr. CAMERON. Just one word more. They were not delivered to the United States. They were taken for the use of the United States to protect Baltimore from going out of the Union. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. My friend from Pennsylvania is becoming too venerable in years and has too short a time to live—though I hope he will live a hundred years—to be talking about the dead past. Let us look to the future. My friend, live for the present and the future and let the dead past take care of itself. I am not talking about either the revolutionary war, the centennial, or the late rebellion. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON. I trust that I shall see the Senator from Maryland twenty or thirty years after this.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I hope so.

Mr. CAMERON. And I shall be very glad if he shall be as vigorous twenty or thirty years after this as I am now, but I should be very sorry if I should ever forget how badly the State of Maryland behaved as a State and how gloriously some of her individuals did, and how much she ought to thank us of the North for keeping her from destroying herself.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I know the honorable Senator from Maryland desires to be accurate. I have not followed all his statements with regard to public buildings; but one, I observe, of which he makes special complaint is the building of the court-house at Springfield, Illinois. That was commenced under the administration of Mr. Buchanan, in 1857, and all this Administration has done is to spend about $9,000 in repairing it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I cannot help that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nobody can.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Allow me to ask, were we in debt then? Was this country ground down under the heel of intolerant taxation?

Mr. HAMLIN. It was borrowing money then.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. We were not then two billion dollars in debt, as we are now. The people were not then clamoring about taxation. I am not talking about that. We can permit ourselves to be a little improvident. We can allow ourselves to spend a little money uselessly, it may be recklessly; but when we have not got it we ought not to spend it.

Here I was going to say one word more. I am talking now of those expenditures that have been made since the war for these various projects. None other have I noticed. I get from the Treasurer's report when these different buildings were begun. Now, I do not object to buildings necessary to be built, but I do object to such costly ones. Suppose that a court-house was needed in Springfield. Acknowledging its necessity, why not get along with a court-house there at a less cost than $295,000? It is too much, Mr. President. We are not to run around this country and ornament the little towns or even the cities in the land by great and extravagant structures. It is not our policy to do so. Our policy is to be frugal in our expenditures and provident in all our enterprises.

Now, Mr. President, I merely call attention to this. One word more, because I do not desire to detain the Senate, but this is an interesting subject, and of importance to the tax-paying people of the country. Until the honorable Senator from California introduced his amendment to tax tea and coffee I had determined to say not one word upon this matter. But what is the fact? Let us look at the annual expenditures. Is it not remarkable that for the year past our expenditures should be $14,000,000 more than they were last year and $40,000,000 more than they were the year before? In 1871, but three years ago, your expenditures were thirty-five millions of money for the Army. Now they are for 1874 $42,000,000 for the Army. Your Indian expenses remain about the same. Your Navy is much more. The expenditure for 1871 was $19,000,000; for 1874, $30,000,000, that is, in round numbers. In 1872 your net ordinary expenditures were $153,000,000, and for 1874 they were $194,000,000, making a difference of $41,000,000 in the net ordinary expenditures between the past year and 1872. In the year 1871 your net ordinary expenditures were $157,000,000. This last year they were $194,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that the ordinary expenses of this Government have increased by that much?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The ordinary net expenditures?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that the ordinary expenses of this Government have increased in the way he has mentioned or anything like it, or at all?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Does the honorable Senator undertake to say that the expenditures were not $157,000,000 in 1871?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I undertake to say, whatever they were in 1871, the expenditures of this Government have not increased since 1871.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The net ordinary expenditures were $153,000,000 in 1872 and the net ordinary expenditures this year are $194,000,000, that is if you believe your documents to be correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Senator, then, to say, reading from his book of figures, that he believes that the expenses of this Government, its actual expenditures of money, have increased in that way? I merely want to get at his belief. I am not talking about the figures he is reading from on a page of the book.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. What is the meaning of this?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am asking the Senator if he believes the expenses have increased.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Of course I think so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If it is not so, your books are all false and they ought to be burned; it is a waste of money to pay for printing them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps the Senator does not understand them.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Will the honorable Senator from Vermont please explain the document that is furnished to us by the gentlemen whom we have at the other end of the avenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a difficult task at all.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It is a task. For illustration, the Army in 1874 cost $42,000,000; in 1871, $35,000,000. What is the cause of that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that the expenses of the Army proper increased in that way?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. What does the Senator from Vermont mean by the word "proper?" There lies the whole question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will tell the honorable Senator what I mean by the word "proper." The expense of paying, feeding, clothing, transporting, and doctoring soldiers and officers.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I understand the honorable Senator; and therefore there are other matters outside of that within the $42,000,000?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Accordingly those matters were in the appropriation of $35,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator means to say that as to the Army expenditure for fortifications and for rivers and harbors, &c., by the War Department, we have done more in respect to fortifications and other things that the engineers of the Army under the War Department built than we have done heretofore. Yet the Senator stands up here to make the country believe that the expenses of the Army have been increased.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I stand up in this body and call the attention of the public to your official document that shows the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not show the fact.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. How are we to get information except from your official documents? I know that Army fortifications are included within this sum, yet included as the item is in the $42,000,000 it is also included in the $35,000,000. But you do not explain that to the people.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me I can explain it in a moment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. As far as the Army is concerned, the expense of the Army is less because the number of men have been reduced; but there has been the Modoc war; and any one who knows anything about it knows that a war, if it does not last two months, if only twenty-five men are engaged in it, is a very expensive luxury.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. In 1873 we spent $46,000,000. Now when you come to the Navy, the Navy in 1871 cost $19,000,000, and in 1874 it cost $30,000,000. Your official documents may mislead you to some extent. You would suppose that is for the Navy, pure and simple, and things directly connected with it; but then the same items are included within the same expenditures of 1871 and of 1874.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator knows that vessels were built and included in that.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I forgot to put down this little mob or emeute at Cuba, in which the Virginius was involved. I know all about that $4,000,000 bill. I opposed it; it ought not to have been passed; but that is of no consequence now.

Then again you have the Indians. The Indians in 1870 cost $3,000,000 in round number; in 1871, $7,000,000; and you are so progressing with your Indian policy until it is absorbing your revenues, costing as much as your whole Government cost in the early days of the country. But what is a remarkable fact, in 1800—I think it was in the last year of the administration of old John Adams, as we call him—the Indians cost us $31.22. [Laughter.] And certainly in the first year of Jefferson's administration they cost us $9,000; and I presume my honorable friend from Illinois knows the fact that the Indians then were somewhat greater in numbers than now. Their camping-ground was where the honorable Senator now lives. There is where at that day they met the white man face to face and contended with him for the mastery of the West.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him right here one point that he probably may have overlooked?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. If you will follow that along down for quite a number of years you will find the Indians not costing anything; and why? Because then the Indian Department and the War Department were the same; it was all included in the expenses of the War Department. The Senator will find that fact in explanation.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The honorable Senator may be right in what he says; but then, indeed, still worse——

Mr. LOGAN. I know I am right.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. But I take your official documents to show that you are wrong. Burn up your documents if we cannot understand them and the people of the country cannot understand them. Here we are daily called upon to expend large sums of money in publishing this worthless stuff for the people. That is if it be all error that is thus put in your official papers; but not so, I apprehend. The officers in charge of the Department but seldom make mistakes in summing up what they spend. They do not make it larger than it ought to be.

But the worst of all, Mr. President, is in your miscellaneous expenditures, which are $85,000,000 for 1874. These expenditures for 1871 were $60,000,000, and for 1872 $53,000,000. Think of it now, I ask. That is the reason I shall vote against any tax bill. Why shall not the Administration, when there is no occasion for these expenditures of money, return to those of the years 1871 and 1872, and if you do so, you have no occasion for increased taxation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. What is the amendment? Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the first and second sections of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles herein mentioned the rates of duty herein prescribed, namely:
On tea of all kinds, 10 cents per pound.
On coffee of all kinds, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, as a substitute for the first and second sections of the bill, I cannot vote for the amendment of the Senator from California. As a substitute for the fourth section, I would vote for it if compelled to take one or the other. But I am opposed to any increase of taxes at this time. If the proposition were to make a reduction such as I think should be made, of $12,000,000 in the customs duties, and substitute therefor the proposition of the Senator from California, I should vote for it.

Mr. McCREERY. Just to bring this matter to a settlement, I move to lay the bill, with the amendment, on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COOPER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARVEY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SCHURZ. Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. WRIGHT. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, Washburn, West, and Windom—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Carpenter, Conkling, Cooper, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Harvey, Ingalls, Lewis, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Schurz, Wadleigh, and Wright—17.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. I listened with attention to the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, and although I have not had an opportunity to examine his figures and find out in what maze he had entangled himself, I desire to call his attention and the attention of the Senate to the amount of the appropriation bills for the last year, and the amount furthermore of the appropriation bills for this year, showing the expenses for this year now running, and the amount for next year. I have here the exact figures of each of those bills, and it makes no difference from which list of figures he may read. I simply state these figures as they are on the statute-books. They are of my own compiling, and I know they are correct. Some of the bills for 1874 are larger than those for the current year, but on the whole there was a large decrease, a saving of millions. The legislative bill for 1874 was $18,170,441; for this current year for the money which we are now expending, $20,758,255; the sundry civil bill spent last year, 1873-'74, $32,173,257, while for this current year we are expending but $26,924,746, a difference of nearly $6,000,000 in favor of the economy of this year. The Army bill for the former year was $31,796,008, while for the current year it was reduced to $27,788,500, a reduction of about $4,000,000. The Navy for the former year was $22,275,707, while for the current year it is $20,813,946. I do not know whether I can have attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please resume their seats.

Mr. SARGENT. I know there is nothing so dull as a column of figures, and yet when a charge is made here in the face of a two-thirds majority of this Senate that year by year we are driving the Treasury into bankruptcy because by the million each year our expenditures have been increased, it is worth while for Senators to know that we did not increase expenditures millions, and the very bills that we have passed upon this year are millions smaller than they were last year, and last year they were many millions smaller than they were the year before.

The river and harbor the former year was $7,352,900; for the current year, $5,228,000. The fortification bill was $1,899,000 the year, before; the current year, $904,000—a reduction of about a million on that item. The Military Academy bill was about the same, a little less this year than last. Last year it was $344,317; the current year $339,835. The Post-Office appropriation bill increases. Last year it was $6,496, 602; the current year, $7,175,542, on account of the great increase of the postal business of the country. That shows a little increase. The pension appropriation bill shows a little decrease this year over last. Last year it was $30,480,000; the current year, $29,980,000. The consular appropriation bill shows some increase. The miscellaneous appropriations show about the same decrease; I mean the miscellaneous appropriations, not the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The deficiency of the past two years was $9,496,406, while the deficiency we had during the last session of Congress was less than half that amount, or $4,053,812.

In round figures, adding up these respective columns, we spent during the last fiscal year $170,424,800, and during the current year we are expending but $151,106,128, or a saving of $19,318,672 in the appropriation bills this year. We are spending less than last year, and that is not taking into account the money which is saved by the purchase of bonds, by the funding of the debt, or by any other means of the saving of expense in the permanent appropriation for interest on the public debt; and furthermore it takes in and allows for the four million emergency bill on account of Cuba, the little row which the gentleman spoke of, and it takes in the Modoc war, and all the other expenses; and nevertheless there is saved in the expenditures this year over last year over $20,000,000.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Let me interrupt the Senator a moment. Does he say that the expenditures of the Modoc war are embraced in the expenditures of this year?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes; because almost all the appropriations were made for that purpose. Of course there are some claims which go over of that kind which we may not get rid of for four or five years to come.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I asked the question because the Senator from Illinois thought the expenditures of the Modoc war were embraced in the expenditures of 1874.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not particular about that. It may be or it may not; but that would not make a difference of nineteen or twenty million dollars. It may be said that during this current year large deficiency appropriations are to be made; that an election was pending in the other House, and consequently the House were obliged in all economy to cut down the expenditures of the Government. In fact, the expenditures of the Government by all means have been reduced $24,000,000. The deficiency bill, as it has just been introduced in the House of Representatives, is about two millions and a half for this current year against $4,000,000 last year. It is the smallest deficiency bill there has been for years. Six years ago the deficiency bill was $23,000,000, and it has been going down year by year. Last year it reached $4,000,000, and this year two millions and a half. My impression is that it will reach $3,000,000 before it gets through the two Houses, and that is a million deficiency less, notwithstanding the reduction of $24,000,000 for this current fiscal year.

As near as I can calculate, and I have taken some pains to verify the figures, the appropriation bills which have passed the Senate and the committees of conference are between four and five million dollars less than last year; that is, this year we are appropriating to spend next year some four or five million dollars less than we appropriated for this current year. Of course I cannot tell what may be done with the river and harbor bill. We have not passed on that question yet; but taking it as the House passed it, then my figures are correct.

So I say, instead of this showing made by the figures of the Senator from Maryland—I know not whence those figures come—taking the actual facts, taking the appropriation bills that have been passed, there is no basis whatever in his statement.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. One word to my honorable friend. He seems to think that the figures I referred to for the purposes of my statements are not to be relied upon.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not say that.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. He says he knows nothing about them. I take them from the finance report of 1874, and that finance report gives substantially what was expended, and that comprises everything. Now the honorable Senator from California states that the expenditures for the present year, that is for the fiscal year ending in June, 1875, are much below those of the preceding year and the year before that. I am not prepared to say that the honorable Senator is not correct in respect to that. This fiscal year has not yet ended, and it will not end until June next, and it is impossible to tell what may or may not happen in the mean time, and until we come here next December. But as far as he has gone, I do not question that the expenditures have been less this year than they were last year, but not low enough in my judgment, the expenditures of last year and of the year before that were so largely in excess of the expenditures of 1871 and 1872. To show that there must be something wrong somewhere, and that we can get along without these large expenditures that occurred in 1873 and 1874, is demonstrable by the facts before us. We did get along in 1871 and 1872 with an expenditure of $153,000,000 and $156,000,000, and in 1873 and 1874 the expenditures were $194,000,000 and $180,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the honorable Senator mean that those were the ordinary expenditures of the various Departments?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. What do you mean by "ordinary?" I speak of expenditures. I mean for pensions, for Indian service, for the Army, for the Navy, for fortifications, for rivers and harbors, and all these purposes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let me instruct my friend.

Mr. SARGENT. I will give way to the Senator from Maine after I make a remark. The error the Senator from Maryland falls into is this: he talks of covering in warrants; he counts money that is covered into the Treasury and drawn out again. Those amounts are charged over and over again, and go to swell the gross sum.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. These are the expenditures.

Mr. SARGENT. They are all called expenditures.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. But the same thing has occurred ever since the organization of this Government, and more or less occurs in every column of figures from 1790 to the present period of time.

Mr. SARGENT. And consequently we find that in 1859, under Buchanan's administration, by the same table the expenditure of the War Department was $23,154,720. Does not the Senator know that it was not anything of the kind? He is troubled about a question of book-keeping.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There was the Utah expedition then. General Johnston was sent there.

Mr. SARGENT. Let me ask the Senator how it was in 1848, when it was $35,000,000?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Take 1847, the Mexican war.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I will take the year previous to 1858, when it was $25,000,000, and take 1857, when it was $19,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind Senators that the rule requires that they must rise and address the Chair. The Chair is unable to assign places on the floor if Senators remain in their seats and address each other in conversation.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose the remark applies to some others, as I was standing in my place when I had the floor, and was addressing the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator does so at the present time, but other Senators did not.

Mr. SARGENT. Turning to the Navy in 1859—they did not send that out to Utah—that cost $15,000,000. Miscellaneous items ran up to $25,000,000, against $3,000,000 that are chargeable under the ordinary appropriation bill. In fact, the trouble is that it is a question of book-keeping entirely, the method of keeping the books. These totals embrace covering-in warrants, as they are called; moneys are drawn and refunded and drawn again. But the expenditures as shown by the Treasurer cover the amount that all the appropriation bills include.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was about to read some figures to show my honorable friend from Maryland how much he is mistaken or how much he deceives himself. I know he hardly wishes to deceive the Senate, nor does he desire to be deceived himself.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Certainly not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. When he talks about expenditures of the Government he ought to talk with some degree of accuracy; and it is so easy to ascertain what the expenditures are or what our appropriations are from year to year that my honorable friend will hardly find himself excusable for a misstatement so broad. In 1873 we appropriated $154,216,751.32; in 1874, $172,290,780; in 1875, the current year, $155,117,758.20.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That I know nothing about.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In round numbers, we appropriated $154,000,000 in 1873, $172,000,000 in 1874, and the current year $155,000,000; and we are appropriating now upon a basis which will reduce that to at least $148,000,000, or $149,000,000 for the coming year. Now, what becomes of my friend's statement of $194,000,000 for this year?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. For the present year, ending June 30, 1874. About the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, I know nothing, for the expenditures are not yet completed for this year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Steadily the Government has gone on reducing its expenditures since the close of the war. The principles of economy and retrenchment have been observed and are being observed. I do not propose to go into that question now; I propose to say a word about the bill under consideration.

I think that the Senate of the United States is in danger of exhibiting itself as a spectacle to the country which will be noticeable now and in all time to come. If we fail to pass a revenue bill this session we shall commit a greater mistake than has been committed by this party since it came into power. Nay, sir, we shall commit a crime against the public faith which will be irreparable, and we shall do it with our eyes open, for we know that now we are delinquent at least $30,000,000, and when this fiscal year closes we shall be delinquent at least $40,000,000, with nothing in the Treasury to make it good, and delinquent to the sinking fund, delinquent in a manner in which our faith as a nation is involved, in which our credit is involved; and if we were to go abroad to fund this debt the first question would be asked, "Have you kept the sinking fund good?" None of us can forget, none of us I think after listening to the speech of my honorable friend the chairman of this committee [Mr. SHERMAN] less than a year ago as to the importance of keeping our faith upon the sinking fund, can fail to appreciate the importance of keeping that faith sacred. We know to-day, and we have known these last twelve months, that we were not keeping the faith with the public creditors of this country. We know that we are delinquent to-day and will be at the end of this fiscal year at least $40,000,000. What is to be done? Do we intend to adjourn and make no preparation to meet that? I hear it said on my left by my honorable friend from Maryland that he is not afraid of the public faith. I am sorry to hear any Senator on this floor make use of that language in view of these facts. Indifferent does he mean to be to the public faith whether it is kept or not? Then why not be willing to do something to redeem the public faith?

What is the way out of this? We have to make these annual appropriations. They are demanded by the public service that is fixed and comparatively inflexible. We know that we are delinquent; we know that the revenues which are now provided for will not more than meet the ordinary expenses for the next year; and this sinking fund is going on and going on at the rate of $31,000,000 a year. What is to be the effect of that on the public credit? What is to become of your public debt? Do you mean to abandon the sinking fund altogether? Do we believe that our democratic friends who are to have charge of the next House of Representatives are to be more patriotic than we? Are we willing to throw the burden, if burden it is, upon that House of Representatives of the next year? And if it is not a burden, are we willing to trust the public credit in those hands? Mr. President, we take upon ourselves here to-night a responsibility in defeating this bill which this party has not taken before since the close of the war, if we do any such thing.

What does the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of this committee, say is the way out? He says that at all hazards the sinking fund must be paid. That is the law. Of all the appropriations you make this year that takes precedence. It will be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay that no matter what follows, no matter what becomes of the appropriations you make here now for the current expenditures of the Government. That is a permanent appropriation and takes the precedence, and the Secretary of the Treasury notifies you that he will hold it his duty to pay that in preference to the expenditures for the ordinary and current administration of the Government.

What then? The Senator from Ohio says suspend the appropriations and of course there is a failure of the administration of public affairs to that extent. To what extent? Nobody can tell. Are the Congress of the United States going to adjourn under such circumstances as those, and do we propose to put the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury in the predicament of discriminating between the branches of the public service, which shall perish? Tell me, Senators, what branch of the public service shall be struck down first, and who shall discriminate. Do we mean before we adjourn to put it upon the record that the President shall be charged to suspend the public service in any direction he chooses? Or does the Senator from Ohio suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury or the President is to take upon himself that discrimination? Are we willing that any executive functionary shall exercise such an authority as that? That is the extremity in which my honorable friend places the public service. He says so distinctly in his speech. Suppose you come short, says that Senator, as short he knows you will come; you are to pay the sinking fund; you will owe at the close of this year $40,000,000; that first and foremost must be paid. That is the law and the Secretary of the Treasury has no discretion whatever. If he has that amount of money in the Treasury he must pay it. Then what? Then, says the Senator, you must make that up out of the public service somewhere in the various branches of the public service. What will you strike?

My honorable friend from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] who has been charged as I think with a very great duty and performed it ably and well, says you cannot afford to strike down the river and harbor bill at all. That touches the people in many vital points, and particularly at that point to which he has devoted so much time, the improvement of the natural water-courses of the country. That demands attention; and is there a Senator here from the West who does not hold it of the first importance, of the highest importance economically and politically? Will we strike at that? When you vote against this bill you strike at the entire civil service of the country. It must all be crippled, and some of its branches must be set aside absolutely and unqualifiedly. That is what the chairman of the Committee on Finance warns you is to take place, and that is what he will have you understand is to take place, either by the arbitrary and absolute necessity of things which we allow to be brought about and place the President and the Executive Departments of the Government in, so that it is impossible to carry on some branches of the service, and throw it all into inextricable confusion, or else we must direct that in the contingency of a failure of the revenues they are authorized to discriminate against any branch of the public service which in their judgment they think can best suffer.

Now, what is the excuse for all this? It is because some of us do not like this bill. Was there ever a tax bill that was agreeable to the American people or to any people? Was there ever a tax that satisfied everybody? Taxes are onerous always; taxes are odious. But this bill comes commended to us from the constituted authority to present it to us. It is presented to us in the best condition they were able to present it. It is said it bears partially upon certain industries. That has been considered undoubtedly. All taxes as a matter of course must bear to some extent with partiality upon particular interests. My honorable friend from Ohio places his opposition to the tax upon whisky on the ground that he does not believe it can be collected. Well, suppose it can not be collected, no harm is done at least in trying. You will not collect less probably by increasing the tax. It is possible you may collect more. But against the judgment of the Senator from Ohio is the judgment, based on experience and a practical knowledge of what may be done in his Department, of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue who tells you he certainly can collect 90 cents and may collect a dollar as well as he can collect the present sum. It would be a marvelous thing in this country if the moral sense of the people had got so low and the efficiency of the public service had got so reduced and weakened that we were to confess to the American people that we did not dare, no matter what the exigencies of the public are, no matter what your public faith requires, to increase the tax on whisky 20 cents for fear that the whole moral and physical energies of this Government could not collect it. I believe in England they collect upon this article something more than $2 a gallon without difficulty. It is a confession we ought not to make. It is said in regard to tobacco that that tax bears unequally. But the answer to all this is, in my judgment, that whatever tax you put upon it is charged over against the consumer. That is the answer. It is not a burden upon the producer; it is charged against the consumers and the consumers are everywhere all over the country. If there is inequality in the taxation, there is wonderful equality in the consumption.

Mr. President, I repeat, taking the position in which the chairman of the Committee on Finance has placed this matter, his statement discloses exactly the condition in which we are to be left. We are either to increase taxes, or certainly, if it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sinking fund, as he believes it is, we are to have a deficiency, and a very large deficiency, in the ordinary expenditures of the Government, and the appropriations you are making to-day are not to be met by some $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 at least.

Now I submit that is to throw the entire civil service of this country into infinite disorder and confusion inexplicable, the result of which no man on earth can foretell, and if a party with its eyes open seeing this peril and this danger can adjourn and go home to meet the commendations of a patriotic people, I shall be greatly mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. The energetic and eloquent remarks of my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] certainly constitute an appeal to me which I feel bound to answer, and answer with all kindness and respect. I can afford to pass by the remarks made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] whose pet schemes I have had occasion sometimes to stand in the way of. I do not choose to reply to him at all; but the statements now made by the honorable Senator from Maine fairly merit a reply. He sees the difficulty in which we are placed, but not, I hope, for the first time. I have known this difficulty for two years and have often brought it to the attention of the Senate. That we were impairing the sinking fund was made known to you and to the Senate often by myself; but the trouble was this, that by the Constitution of the United States, which he and I are bound to support, the House of Representatives alone could originate a tax bill or provide any means of repairing a decaying revenue.

Now, I ask my honorable friend in all fairness can he blame the Committee on Finance or myself or any members of the Senate for not meeting this question sooner? I believe he will not do so, nor can he, because we had no power to originate a tax bill. At the last session of Congress the House of Representatives, which has power to pass upon this subject, deliberately decided by vote, after long debates, that there was no occasion for a bill raising revenue, and they refused to send one to us. However, at the heels of the session they sent to us a bill called the little tariff bill, not designed to raise revenue, but simply to cure certain imperfections in the existing revenue laws. That was sent to us, just like this tax bill, at so late a period of the session that it was impossible for us to amend it; and, pursued by the same line of objections that is now made, we reported that tax bill and could not by possibility pass it. We added nothing to it, because there was no time, no opportunity. It was known that any amendment of an affirmative character put upon that bill would defeat it, and for the purpose of saving the little good in it we endeavored to simply strike out the objectionable features, and even then were not able to pass it. At the present session of Congress it was not in a condition to be open to amendment, and therefore the Senate was precluded from proposing any new taxes. We have had no opportunity to deal with this important question of raising the revenues of the Government until within the last two or three days. Now that a bill is sent to us, what are the circumstances connected with it? As to what occurred in the House of Representatives I am forbidden by the rules to speak; but the actual history of events and the provisions of the bill itself we are bound to consider.

What is the fact? A bill was reported in the House, debated, considered, and defeated. The votes of the House of Representatives were disregarded, and finally this bill was put through under the previous question without debate, without opportunity of amendment, and thus passed this bill is sent to us here, and here it is. The Committee on Finance took up that bill and considered it fairly and candidly, without any prejudice whatever. I need not say what occurred there. That this bill is defective every man knows; that it contains provisions which are inconsistent with each other is admitted on all hands; that it taxes tobacco on hand and refuses to tax whisky on hand, that it piles up the whole burden of taxation upon one portion of this country, that it destroys or impairs two of the most important sources of revenue of this Government, that it proposes following over the old track of raising the whisky tax for the purpose of giving a bounty to whisky-owners to the destruction of the revenue, is manifest to every man who will consider the question.

But my honorable friend with great zeal insists that we can collect a tax of 90 cents in this country on whisky. Why does he say so? Because England has done it and England can do it. But how does England do it? By making the manufacture of spirits in England an absolute monopoly, so that no man can manufacture spirits in England except by giving a bond that can only be given by great corporations, and the result is that the manufacture of spirits in England is concentrated into a few hands by monopoly laws. Would my honorable friend from Maine, who I know is as honest and candid a man as lives, have our Government follow the example of Great Britain by hedging around the manufacture of whisky by these laws of monopoly? Our laws, so far as they can go in this free country of ours, have thrown guards around the whisky manufacturer, but we cannot absolutely deny to the people all over this country the right of engaging in this manufacture and traffic if they choose to do so. We cannot so frame our laws as to destroy all the stills in North Carolina and Tennessee and all the mountain country where spirits are manufactured out of fruit as well as grain. We cannot pass our laws so that only a few favored monopolists and in a few favored localities may manufacture whisky. It is contrary to the spirit of our laws. But we have gone as far as we dared in framing our system of revenue laws. We have made a severe law, which levies a tax of 300 per cent. on a production which can be made simply by boiling mash—a process that can be concealed in some cases under one of these tables. The manufacture of spirits from molasses could be concealed under an ordinary table. We have guarded this product with all the skill and care and with all the penalties that can be thrown around it, and we have shown after the experience of several years that we are able to collect with the utmost vigilance 70 cents a gallon on whisky.

Why, sir, the present law was only framed after an experience of some four or five years of utter failure, nor until our revenue from this source had almost entirely disappeared. Then with the aid of the best officers, those who were skilled in that business, a system of taxes was devised by which several separate taxes were imposed on whisky, the whole aggregating about 70 cents a gallon; first 50 cents a gallon on the whisky and then a barrel tax and other taxes, and we thus devised and finally framed a system which enabled us to collect $50,000,000 revenue annually from whisky.

A few years ago we thought it more convenient to combine all these taxes into one and levy the whole of the taxes on whisky at 70 cents a gallon, and we have gone on now collecting a fair and honest revenue, losing according to the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue only 5 per cent. by illicit distillation. Are we to tear up the system, to destroy it, to impair it and injure it upon any light ground? I say, no, sir. I am as anxious to protect the honor of this country, to protect the revenues of this country as any man can be, and I think I have shown it, but I am not to be deterred, I tell the Senator from Pennsylvania, from the performance of my duty by any ad captandum remarks made by him. Sir, I utterly despise and condemn and deprecate such an attempt to cast reproaches here on honorable Senators who are better republicans than he.

But, Mr. President, not to get off the line of the remarks of my honorable friend from Maine, I tell you the reason why I did not favor the increased whisky tax: first, because it is a bounty to those who are most anxious to have this bill passed, the men who hold spirits; and in the next place it endangers the most stable and the most productive source of revenue. Besides, it is a sudden interference with the ordinary operations of trade. It cuts down just at this season of the year a market for corn, the most important agricultural product of this country. It makes this heavy tax fall mainly on those sections of the country in the Northwest where corn grows most bountifully. Therefore it is that we who have not only to protect the people of the United States but the interests of our own States have a right to look upon this measure with more care and scrutiny than my honorable friend cares to bestow upon it.

Then in regard to the other tax—the tax on tobacco. There we have a stable income, the second source of revenue. A bill is sent to us that discriminates against manufacturers of tobacco, discriminates against the little cigar-makers, thousands of whom are employed in the State of Ohio and all over the Middle States. It imposes a tax that in my judgment is unjust and, if a law can be so called, a dishonorable tax. Sir, if there was anything settled by the history of the legislation of three years ago, it was that this tobacco tax was considered a finality. All the parties interested in the tobacco tax agreed upon it, voted for it, and passed it on the ground that it was a settlement of the controversy that existed between the high and low grades of tobacco. All parties interested—officers of the Government and others—concur that 20 cents a pound, the equivalent of over 200 per cent. upon the article, was as high as the tax should be. In harmony with that tax, and to enable it to be collected, we put the severest penalties on men growing the tobacco. We forbade them selling their leaf except to licensed dealers, although it was the production of their honest industry, the industry mainly of colored people in the Southern States. We forbade them from selling their product, although a simple agricultural product, in order to guard and protect the revenue; and yet they submitted to it. Here for several years the representatives of those States have endeavored to relax these provisions about the tobacco-tax. I have resisted it over and over again, and thus far the Senate has been able to prevent any relaxation of the tax on tobacco.

Now suddenly, without preparation, without its being discussed in the country, a proposition is made to increase the tax 50 to 100 per cent. on the value of the cheaper tobacco. The whole grade of tax is raised from 20 to 24 cents a pound. You say it is only tobacco. Why, sir, this is a tax of 300 or 400 per cent. on an agricultural production. It is an unequal tax. Here is the leaf-tobacco of Connecticut, worth 40 or 50 cents a pound. Here is the ordinary tobacco raised in Kentucky and Ohio, worth 4 or 5 or 6 cents a pound. In order to procure a revenue we agreed that the tax should be uniform, although we knew it to be unjust; and yet after this tax has been settled and has yielded you a bountiful harvest of $36,000,000 a year, you without their knowledge suddenly raise the tax because, forsooth, you want to protect the sinking fund!

Why, sir, does not every man know that for two years and a half this sinking fund has been taken for your current appropriations? For two years it has been deficient more than it is now? Is my honorable friend from Maine now to learn that two years ago, when these accumulated appropriation bills had exhausted the Treasury, the sinking fund had been eaten out. During the year ending 30th of June, 1874, twenty-five millions of the sinking fund had been absorbed, I think without law, to make good the appropriation bills passed by Congress. Why then was there not an appeal to the honor of the country? Why then was not public attention called to it? Why then were not taxes demanded? I was here to do it. I did demand it. I appealed for the support of the sinking fund, but, as I said before, there was no power in the Senate to originate tax bills. We had the power, however, to stop appropriation bills. Was it done? No, Senators, they came here mountain high, and you heaped mountains upon them. That is the way you protected your national honor; that is the way you attempted to save the sinking fund!

Sir, it will not do for us to talk about dishonoring the Government by wasting the sinking fund, when I for years have been calling attention to it over and over again, until I was ashamed to speak on the subject; and yet you were appropriating millions upon millions on every appropriation bill that came here, and when you knew that those appropriation bills could only be paid out of the very sinking fund which you now talk so much about. I trust honorable Senators will look at this thing fairly.

But, sir, that is not all. Because we, forsooth, the representatives of States as good as yours, because I, the representative of three millions of people, declare to you that this law is unjust, wrong, inconsiderately passed, never acted upon as a whole by any committee, never acted upon in any legislative body where there was an opportunity to amend it, I am to be denounced. Coming here as it does, we are told that we dare not amend it or we destroy it. I tell you I will amend it if I can or I will vote to kill it. That is not the way in which the Senate of the United States ought to treat a great public measure imposing thirty millions of taxes upon our people. No, sir; this bill is full of incongruities, it is full of objectionable provisions, and I say we are bound either to have an opportunity to be heard, to amend it, or to defeat it. I will do it if I can.

Now, Mr. President, let us go a little further. My honorable friend says that here, occupying the position I do, I have no remedy but to stop appropriations. What other remedy is there? Shall we pass this tax-bill sent to us in this way, full of crude errors, under the spur of the close of the session? That is one way. But shall we do that when we believe that the measure is wrong, that it will not produce the effects supposed to follow from it, when we know it is composed of four sections, two of which are to destroy or impair, as we think, two of the most fruitful sources of revenue, and another is to add another mountain load of taxation upon sugar consumed in every family, and another to add on additional 10 per cent. to all textiles and metallic fabrics at a time when there is general distress in this country; and because, forsooth, we do not swallow this bill without amendment, without debate, and without consideration, we are looked upon almost as revolutionists and taunted with being "weak-kneed republicans."

Now, Mr. President, I come to the other remedy proposed, which is the right one, and I trust the Senate of the United States will now boldly give us that remedy. My honorable friend from Maine is the very man to lead in it. Suppose we do not call upon our people for any more taxes; we will have, for the next fiscal year, according to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $191,000,000 of revenue over and above the interest of the public debt. The sinking fund, according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, is $31,000,000, leaving $160,000,000 to pay your ordinary current expenses. Make due allowance for the estimated falling off of the customs duties, and you still have one hundred and fifty millions of current revenue to meet ordinary expenditures.

Is not that enough? The expenditure for similar purposes for 1872 was $153,200,000. Why cannot you cut your suit according to your cloth? If you say you will not thrust on the President the duty of refusing to expend money that you do not provide, cut down your appropriations. There are enough appropriation bills now behind to make it impossible that a deficiency should occur. You can cut down the appropriations to the amount of the anticipated deficiency without impairing a single branch of the public service. I know it can be done, and I appeal to my honorable friend to do it. In the appropriation bills—some of which are passed, some of which are in committees of conference, some of which are yet to come before us—there are $26,000,000 appropriated for public works. You can suspend these. It has been done many a time. Did we not do it in Buchanan's time? Was it not done after the panic of 1847? After the panic of 1857 it was done. It has been done several times when money fell short rather than impose taxes on the people.

I was a member of Congress in 1857 when the very same circumstances came before us. In March, 1857, before Congress adjourned, we scattered money for public buildings of every kind. We appropriated large sums; we bought the public debt then outstanding at a premium of 16 or 17 per cent. The terrible financial panic of 1857 came on, sweeping in its frightful course large fortunes of men that supposed themselves to be beyond the reach of danger of want—all swept away by the failure of a single corporation. When we came back here the December after the question came up what should we do; should we levy taxes upon the people? We had only the session before repealed taxes, and we had paid off much of the public debt; we had made enormous appropriations. When we came back in December, 1857, all our expectations of revenue were gone. What did we do then? We at once stopped appropriations; we declared that certain public works which had been authorized at the previous session should not be commenced, and we compelled the administration of James Buchanan, then just freshly installed in power, to adopt a system of retrenchment, and we withheld appropriations and reduced expenditures. We provided a temporary loan to meet the sudden emergency. In this way we met the financial panic of 1857.

Now, sir, I say to all the gentlemen who desire to make local improvements, who want to build grand palaces for local offices by transporting the granite from Maine to interior cities, who want to build marble palaces in small towns, who want to improve their harbors, to all who want to commence great schemes of internal improvement, wait awhile; this country of ours will live long after we are dead. The resources of our people are growing every year. Leave something for the future to be performed. Let us husband our resources now in this time of financial necessity.

Sir, that is my advice now; and while I was willing to pass a reasonable tax bill, I see no occasion of haste. If we can pass a tax bill that would appeal to our sober judgment the House of Representatives would probably agree to it; but if they should not, then no great harm is done, and we can and must reduce our expenditures to the volume of our receipts. By your appropriation bills, some of which have gone beyond the power of reduction here, you authorize expenditures for objects that may be postponed. The President has the power to reduce them or withhold them. When money is appropriated by you, it is not made mandatory on the President to expend it; the Secretary of the Treasury is not bound to pay money that he has not got. The President of the United States can by an executive order simply say, "Congress has appropriated more money than I can reasonably expect to receive under existing revenue laws within this year, and therefore it is my duty to cut off here and there." You can save him the trouble to a great extent now by reducing your appropriations.

But, sir, when these two alternatives are presented to me, the one plan the reduction of expenditure and the other the increase of ill-considered taxes imposing new burdens on our people already distressed by this financial panic, I have no difficulty in choosing, and in doing so I follow the path to which my judgment leads me, and no man can deter me from pursuing it.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator inform us what kind of a tax bill he would have?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to take the Senator's proposition. The tax on tea and coffee and sugar will furnish the Government all the money it wants, and that is purely a revenue tax. A tax of 3 cents on coffee yielding you nine millions, 15 cents on tea yielding $9,000,000, and the sugar tax in this bill will give you twenty-six millions; and every dollar of that will go into the Treasury of the United States, and you will commence to receive it in sixty days.

This is not a time for us to quarrel about protective and revenue tariffs. I am naturally a protectionist, as it is called. I believe in building up our interests by giving to every industry that can be developed in this country a reasonable protection until it may walk and compete with the markets of the world. I do not conceal my opinions; but this is not the time for a protective tariff, this is not the time to give the manufacturers any additional bounty; this is a time to give our Government revenue from those sources that will produce revenue most cheaply and most certainly. What are they? The judgment of all civilized nations has pointed to a few leading articles of common consumption by all classes of people, rich and poor, as the natural sources of income. They tax coffee; they tax tea; they tax sugar. Why do we tax sugar now and not tea and coffee? Why is it now that a clamor has been raised in some parts of the country against a tax on tea and coffee, and not against the tax on sugar? The only reason is because sugar in small quantities is produced in this country, and to levy this tax will give what is called a protection to the sugar interest. In ordinary times I am willing to consider that. If we were not pressed for money, I should be willing to say how much ought to be conceded to the sugar-planters of Louisiana just as I would to the iron-mongers of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the West. But now we want revenue, and wanting revenue, the only natural resource is to take those objects of taxation which by the common judgment of the civilized world are objects of revenue; take tea, coffee, and sugar. England is a wise nation, a great nation, that has gone through many experiences on this subject, and she has settled now on taxing a few leading articles, and from those receives an overflowing revenue which supplies her expensive government.

Sir, I am willing to maintain our protective laws. I am willing to give to all interests in this country that can be developed by a reasonable protective duty every advantage and opportunity. Now the occasion will not allow us to increase this protection. We must now tax for revenue, for we need it.

Shall we now as prudent men attempt to inaugurate a vast system of internal improvements; shall we now pay $6,000,000 to clean out our rivers and harbors, and perhaps add $11,000,000 more, the amount which I am told is now proposed as amendments to the river and harbor bill; shall we now spend $26,000,000 in public works. We have appropriated $1,000,000 for fortifications against whom? Sir, if we must go on with these works and there is no stopping them; if we cannot reduce and limit our appropriations, but must levy more taxes, then in the name of Heaven let us levy such taxes as will produce revenue immediately. That would be taxes on tea, coffee, and sugar.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended. I said to my honorable colleague on the committee, the Senator from Vermont, that while I could not vote for this bill, I would not embarrass him at all in the conduct of a bill that was brought to him under circumstances that he felt compelled him to oppose all amendments. Therefore, I have offered no amendment; I have proposed none. I have only voted for the one that was offered because, as he himself suggested, it might form a test vote to ascertain those who are for or against this bill. I do not want to embarrass the passage of the bill. I say now if the Senate is willing to consider the subject, and think the bill as it now stands is not such a one as the public interests demand, then I am willing to join with all who will support a simple measure, short and brief, that will, with the consent of the House, give us instantaneously, within sixty days, the commencement of a revenue ample to meet even your large appropriations. And in what I say I wish my honorable friend from Maine to understand me. I do not complain of him for the amount of these appropriations. They are no more than they have been before. They are less. What he has said in reply to the Senator from Maryland is perfectly correct, that the appropriation bills for the next fiscal year are less than they are during the present year, and for the present fiscal year they were less than they were for the last. The culminating point of our appropriations was in the year that preceded and included the panic. And it is always so. Always just before a panic there is great credit inflation, and the bubble bursts when no one anticipates it. The largest appropriations were made the very session before the panic took place. Those appropriations were outstanding. They were expended in that fiscal year commencing June 30, 1873, but from that time to this they have been going down. They can be reduced more, and in my humble judgment they can be reduced enough to wipe out the deficiency which now alarms and frightens for the first time my honorable friend from Maine.

Sir, the way to make good the title of this bill, to maintain the sinking fund, and to meet our existing deficiency is either to pass such a revenue bill as I mentioned or else to cut down your appropriations until we reach the solid rock; and then your existing tariff, your existing revenue laws, will give you all the money that is necessary, not only to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government, but to make ample appropriations for new public works, and to embark in new schemes of public improvement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I confess my astonishment, Mr. President, at the heat and passion shown by the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask my honorable friend this: If he heard himself arraigned here as a "weak-kneed republican" before his fellow-countrymen and his fellow-Senators, and if besides that a bill that no Senator here would care to vote for were thrown in his teeth, and he was told in very polite language that he wished to prevent a silent monument from being put at the head of the grave of the poor soldier, on a bill that I believe the Senate would not touch if it was brought up and debated before them, I ask the Senator if I was not entitled to show a little heat?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, no attacks about another bill would change my course here on a bill that the public necessities of the Government required.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not changed my course.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The mere fact that some Senator had seen fit to arraign me for not voting for a bill amounting to $1,600 would not have changed my course on a measure of public necessity; and I will say to the Senator, as Sir Isaac Newton said in relation to the public expenditures of the Agricultural Department when he had charge of it, that the hostility of the Senator from Ohio to the present bill has exceeded my most sanguine expectations. [Laughter.] The chairman of the Committee on Finance has, as he said, often here urged the importance of our preservation of the sinking fund, and yet he has suffered himself in this passionate appeal at this late hour of the session to obliterate all that and to denounce the party to which he and I belong for having paid little or no attention to it for the last three or four years, while now he himself refuses to support a bill to further protect the sinking fund. He confesses that the object is of sufficient importance to induce him to vote for a tax bill if it can be made to suit him, but he has arraigned this bill as not being such a bill, and the way and manner in which it has been brought from the House appears to him very objectionable. Why, Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Finance very well knows—no one better—that no bill comes from the House except through the operation of the previous question on the subject of the tariff. It is almost impossible that a bill of this kind can be considered and brought to such symmetrical shape as would be proper for adoption by any House where various heterogeneous amendments are offered and considered and adopted or rejected in a helter-skelter manner, as they always have been and always will be.

But, Mr. President, I am very sure that there is more merit in this bill than has yet appeared, and I am better satisfied now that there is some prospect of its passage since this hot and unjust attack upon it than there has ever been before. I had supposed from the start, with the chairman of the Committee on Finance against it, that it stood no chance whatever; but from the way and manner in which it has been assailed by him the bill must have gathered strength, and I am induced to believe that it has now some chance. I know that he says if he cannot amend it he will vote to kill it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will vote against it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then one single word in relation to this general cry about putting money into the pockets of those who have whisky on hand. That has always been so, always will be so. Losses will also occur upon stocks on hand when taxes are removed. It cannot be helped; but it is not to any such extent as represented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. If the tax is increased the price of whisky will not go up very much more for some considerable time. It will rise gradually. Nor will the fact that we have increased the tax upon whisky prevent the use of corn in the manufacture of whisky. The same amount that we manufactured last year will be manufactured the year to come, and those who have got the corn to sell will get the same price for it and sell it as readily as though the tax had not been put on.

But, Mr. President, I hope that we may now get the vote. I think the discussion of the subject is entirely exhausted, and if it is not certainly I am, and I hope we may have a vote upon the amendments and get through with the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say a word or two in reference to the observations made by the Senator from Ohio. That this is the best possible tax bill that might be prepared I have not said. It may be obnoxious to some charges brought by the Senator from Ohio. Very likely it is. I dare say that the Committee on Finance might have produced to us a bill more equitable in its general relations than this, but that is not the question we are considering. This is the only bill we are to have. We cannot originate it. It has originated in the proper quarter. It is this or nothing. That is just as evident as that Thursday is coming and that at twelve o'clock on that day we are dissolved, and that is the end of our control of a tax bill so far as we are a party, and then with all the sins and omissions on our head we go to our account. That is clear. If we are ready to abdicate, very well. If we have got our books all balanced, if we are ready to take an account of stock, if we are willing to say, "We stand well; we have provided as a party responsible for the consequences ought to do, and we are willing to render an account to the people of this country now and hereafter," very well. For one I am not ready to abdicate. For one I wish to take the responsibilities which belong to us, and not shuffle them off on our democratic friends who are to come after us and hereafter are to originate these bills. We have our duties; we have had our responsibilities and we have met them manfully and faithfully up to this hour. Shall we shrink now? Do we mean to allow the power to go out of our hands next year with a responsibility upon the democrats which they will throw in our faces, with the public faith repudiated, and that sinking fund crying out against us a thing which we cannot answer? For one I do not; and therefore, although this bill may not square with all that might be said of it as the best possible revenue measure, I will take it as it is the best we can get, and the best we can get is a boon under these circumstances.

Now, one word as to what we can do without it. My honorable friend says we can reduce the appropriation bills so that there will be no deficiency. No deficiency in what? Enough to cover the sinking fund? My honorable friend does not touch that question at all. We can reduce the appropriations so as to do what? So that we might possibly skim along and stint the public service and live? Do we want to live at that poor dying rate? He talks about twenty-six millions for public works. We do not propose to make any such appropriation as that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. All that is proposed for public buildings is five millions by the other House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is about $5,000,000—not more than that. Now for public defenses there is less than $1,000,000. How is that for public defenses? How much shall we appropriate for internal improvements?

Mr. SARGENT. Only $900,000 for fortifications.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How much for internal improvements? That is a question that interests the great West more than any other section of this country. Are you willing to cut off from that? Would it be just? Is that good government? Is there not a more exigent demand from that section of the country for appropriations in that direction than from any other section of this country for any other thing at all? Are we in a condition to ignore that altogether? I think not. I think you will find that the public service in that respect will suffer vastly more than any public interest or private interest will suffer by the passage of this tax bill.

Then the argument of my honorable friend does not hold good at all, that we may postpone this to another day. What other day? Tell me when the clock strikes twelve on Thursday what other day you have to promise the country that your voice shall be heard in what shall be taxed, or how we will tax, or how these revenues shall be raised. That is the question. And tell me what reason there is now for postponing a revenue bill that will not obtain next year.

My honorable friend says we have been in the habit of postponing public works whenever there is an emergency, whenever there is a panic; but there is not a panic now. Does anybody believe we are to be in a better condition next year than we are now to levy a tax, even if we were in power? Is there any reason why we should postpone this until next year? None at all that I am aware of. The circumstances of the future are not so rosy as to justify the postponement of any question which we can settle now. And this solid phalanx on my right is an admonition that we must work while the day lasts. Why do our friends on my right vote solidly against this bill? This is our responsibility. This is our obligation. This is our duty. They will take it as they find it, and it will be to our sorrow and regret if we allow them to take it under the circumstances in which the country will be left if this bill does not pass.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, for the last several hours I have attempted occasionally to obtain the floor to say a few words. I thought, however, that I would not, and now I think I will. I am not disposed to criticise this bill at length, though I can do so very readily and very candidly. One objection I have, and that is a simple one, but with me it is a very substantial one, to the proposed tax upon whisky of 90 cents. I would not have stopped at 90. I would have gone to 100 at the very first effort. I would have placed it at one round dollar, easily counted in fractions or otherwise. So far as the tobacco is concerned it is a very small matter with me, and that might well wait; and if it was not for the idea of amending the bill I would have no objection to voting for an amendment to waive the tax on tobacco and put it all on whisky. There is no difficulty about whisky standing it. If we are already informed correctly, I have no hesitancy in saying that there are some 47,000,000 gallons on hand now. If there are all those millions, they will be upon hand. Why am I authorized unmistakably to declare that fact? It is only to judge the future by the past and the present. It is clear that from the action of the great American people at the last election the democracy are coming into power very rapidly. They are upon us, and with them come untold volumes of whisky, because they go together invariably. [Laughter.] During "the unpleasantness," as it is sometimes termed, I know in my country that a barrel of whisky was considered very low at $500. Any man might buy himself out of the Army upon any occasion almost with any of the officers if he would just show them a keg of whisky or a demijohn or a jugful or anything of the kind, and he could go wherever he pleased free and easy. They were compelled to have it. They did have it; and I believe that but for whisky that war never would have existed. I am one of those individuals who wish to make war upon whisky whenever I have an opportunity to do so; and this is a legitimate one.

As to the amendment proposed now to tax tea and coffee, that is unnecessary. It is childish to some extent. We are not driven to that extreme. But a few years ago, speaking comparatively, we repealed that duty. I do not wish to retract that action. I would do so were it necessary to sustain the honor of my Government; but it is not, because whisky can do the needful in the absence of tobacco, tea, coffee, and everything. I would go further; I would make whisky pay the national debt and resume specie payments upon it, or I would drive it out of the land at the very first opportunity if I had the power to do so. I would not be very likely to succeed except I did have remarkable power, for it is a mighty giant. I have no sympathy with those gentlemen who are now holding large quantities of whisky. I have no animosity against them, nor have I against any man or any avocation or business that is recognized by the laws of the land. Still, I say there is nothing that will be more substantially beneficial to the citizens of the United States than to suppress whisky, the manufacture and use of it in all its various ramifications, save in some few particulars.

Mr. SPRAGUE. What would you do for revenue?

Mr. FLANAGAN. I would make whisky pay the revenue. You would indorse that, my friend, without any difficulty. They are not going to abandon whisky; it is in use and it will continue to be used, and therefore let us bank upon it. It is abundantly able. I shall vote for this bill if I do not change my views as it is, and I am opposed to any amendment that can be offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHURZ. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] He would vote "nay" if here, and I would vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 6, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conover, Jones, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, and Stewart—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Scott, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—56.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Carpenter, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Lewis, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, and Wadleigh—11.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARVEY, (as his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. SCHURZ, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] He would vote "nay" if he were present, and I would vote "yea."

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) I again announce my pair with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I would vote "yea" on this motion.

The Chief Clerk concluded the roll-call; and the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Washburn, West, and Windom—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Carpenter, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Lewis, Morton, Patterson, Schurz, Wadleigh, and Wright—14.

So the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4833) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and remit certain taxes and penalties claimed to be due from mining and other corporations in the sixth collection district of Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. Will not the Senator allow that bill to be taken up?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we can settle about taking it up in the morning. It is very late now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and seventeen minutes a. m. of Tuesday, March 2) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 1, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

READING OF THE JOURNAL WAIVED.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent during the session of Saturday, the reading of the Journal this morning was waived.

GAUGERS AT THE PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill (H. R. No. 4850) authorizing the appointment of gaugers for the customs service at the port of Philadelphia, and to ask that it be put upon its passage at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint three gaugers at that port from the list of officers under appointment as inspectors, whose position shall be the same as that of the gaugers of the port of Boston; provided the number of officers or employés in the customs service at such port of Philadelphia shall not be hereby increased.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have some explanation of that bill.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which will explain the bill, and I will ask, if there is no objection, that it may be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to the reading, but reserve the point of order that it creates a new office.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1875.

SIR: By a defect existing for some time past in the general law in regard to the compensation of gaugers from fees, the office of gauger at the principal ports has necessarily been provided for by special salary, or by detail of other officers.

At the port of Philadelphia, however, the gaugers were not provided for, by salary or otherwise, and the defect in this respect was disclosed on the revision of the laws enacted in June last.

There are now three inspectors doing the duty of gaugers, and there should be this number of gaugers authorized by law.

This will not be an increase of the force employed at the custom-house at Philadelphia, but will only give the officers employed as gaugers the designation proper for the duties they perform.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Hon. H. L. DAWES,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES VALIER.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to report back a bill (H. R. No. 3808) for the relief of Charles Valier, and to ask that it be put upon its passage at this time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to recognize the military service of Charles Valier, late of Company M, Seventh Regiment of Illinois Cavalry, as second lieutenant of said company and regiment, and to pay him, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of cavalry from the 20th day of January, 1864, to the 15th day of April, 1865, deducting therefrom the amount received by him as sergeant of said company and regiment for the time above specified.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 320) fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read, so we may know what it is.

The bill, which was read, provides that the number of paymasters be established at fifty, instead of sixty, as was designated in the eighteenth section of the act of July 28, 1866; said paymasters to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and further, that so much of said eighteenth section as relates to the persons from whom said paymasters shall be selected be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SPEER. I must object to this bill.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to supend the rules and pass the bill. It has the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Military Affairs, It effects a reduction in the Pay Department of ten.

Mr. SPEER. Was not this defeated at the last session of Congress after full discussion?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. No.

Mr. SPEER. Was not a similar bill defeated?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. No such bill last session was up for discussion here. This is a Senate bill, and ought to pass.

A MEMBER. Does not this increase the number of officers in the Pay Department?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It does not increase the number. The number now is sixty, and this proposes to fix it hereafter at fifty. Besides, the bill opens the door to promotion, and not to old paymasters only, but to anybody whom the President may select.

Mr. SPEER. Does my colleague say this will decrease expenses?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It would if the door is opened to promotion and the number of paymasters reduced.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The condition of affairs is simply this: the law provides for sixty paymasters, but appointments and promotions have been stopped, and the number has run down to forty-one. That number cannot do the work of paying off the Army. This proposes to open the service to promotion and increase the number of paymasters to fifty. It is a shame that we should not do that.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask if this bill has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It has been considered by that committee, and I am instructed to report it.

Mr. SPEER. Then I withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad for passage the bill (H. R. No. 4320) to amend the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, 1868.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a new section be, and is hereby, added to the act entitled "An act relative to filing reports of railroad companies," approved June 25, 1868, to stand as section 5 of said act, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That in addition to the reports required by the provisions of this act to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the 1st day of October in each year, the said corporations shall, on or before the same day in each and every year hereafter, file with the Secretary of the Treasury a full and true statement for the year ending on the 30th day of June prior thereto, sworn to by the president of said corporation, specifying—

"Forty-third, what freight and transportation companies run on its road, and on what terms;

"Forty-fourth, whether such freight and transportation companies use the cars of the railroad corporation or the cars furnished by themselves;

"Forty-fifth, whether the freight or cars of such companies are given any preference in speed or order of transportation; and, if so, in what particular;

"Forty-sixth, what running arrangements it has with other railroad corporations, setting forth the contract for the same;

"Forty-seventh, the number of acres of land sold during the year, and the price received therefor.

"And the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall, in addition to the foregoing requirements, report the amount received during the year for the transportation of passengers and freight across the Missouri River, between Council Bluffs and Omaha, with the schedule of rates charged for the same.

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared suitable blanks upon which to make the foregoing reports, and forward the same to the respective corporations.

"Every corporation neglecting to make and furnish such report at the time and in the manner hereinbefore specified shall forfeit to the use of the United States of America the sum of $100 for each day's neglect, to be recovered by the Secretary of the Treasury; and if any corporation unreasonably refuses or neglects to comply with the provisions of said section, it shall forfeit, for every such refusal or neglect, a sum not exceeding $10,000. And a continuous neglect or refusal by any corporation for the term of six months shall work a forfeiture of all its rights and franchises."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed.

Mr. COTTON. I desire to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill which has been read passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill is a report from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. RANDALL. I must object to the passage of the bill unless there can be an opportunity to explain it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I am quite ready to explain it if an opportunity be afforded me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is on the floor to move a suspension of the rules, and he asks leave to make an explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I will state that the original charter of the Pacific Railroad Company required them to make a report to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the law was modified and changed in 1868 so that the report was required to be made to the Secretary of the Interior. I think there is a misunderstanding in regard to the bill. It applies only to the Pacific railroads chartered by the General Government, and would not act on any other railroad. It would only apply to the Pacific railroads. Its design is to carry out the requirements of the original charter.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the gentleman if it contains any amendatory provisions excepting in regard to the returns?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. It is an amendatory act that applies strictly to those companies that were chartered by the acts of 1862 and 1864.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules in order that the House may proceed to business on the Speaker's table and take from thence the civil-rights bill and refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. Of course nothing is expected to be done with that bill; but I desire to put it beyond all cavil and put it out of the way, and then the House can go to the Speaker's table and take up the bills thereon, allowing five minutes' debate pro and con on each bill and then dispose of the bill, subject of course to points of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Ah! Mr. Speaker, there is too much in that motion.

Mr. ARCHER. Why not suspend the rules and put the civil-rights bill at the bottom of the bills on the Speaker's table?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not mean to pass that bill or try to pass it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that order be preserved in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not mean to antagonize by this motion the appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. I myself entered a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the appropriation bills, and I yielded only to unanimous consents.

The SPEAKER. Did the Chair recognize the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I withdraw my motion for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments the bill (H. R. No. 4727) explanatory of an act passed June 20, 1874.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3912) to reduce and fix the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870.

AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to suspend the rules and pass the preamble and resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas both branches of the Legislature of Louisiana have requested the special committee of this House to investigate the circumstances attending the election and returns thereof in that State for the year 1874; and whereas said committee have unanimously reported that the returning board of that State, in canvassing and compiling said returns and promulgating the result wrongfully applied an erroneous rule of law, by reason whereof persons were awarded seats in the house of representatives of Louisiana to which they were not entitled, and persons entitled to seats were deprived of them:

Resolved, That it is recommended to the house of representatives of Louisiana to take immediate steps to remedy said injustice and to place the persons rightfully entitled in their seats.

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill is of higher privilege than the motion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

The SPEAKER. That motion has not been made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio told me he had made it.

The SPEAKER. He may have desired to make it, but he has not made it. In order to his making that motion it was necessary that he should be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Are we not entitled to separate votes on these two resolutions?

The SPEAKER. You are not.

Mr. POTTER. Will not the gentleman from Massachusetts permit separate votes on the resolutions?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have moved to suspend the rules and pass the preamble and resolutions together.

Mr. POTTER. Do I understand the Chair to rule that in no form have we a right to have the resolutions divided?

The SPEAKER. The way in which the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is submitted is that the rules be suspended and those resolutions agreed to.

Mr. POTTER. Both?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. POTTER. Very well.

Mr. SPEER. Could the gentleman make a motion to suspend the rules and pass a dozen resolutions together?

The SPEAKER. Yes. A motion to suspend the rules could pass every bill on the table if two-thirds of the House said so.

Mr. RANDALL. Then there is no relief but to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. CESSNA. That is right. You can have the yeas and nays with pleasure.

Mr. NIBLACK. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow separate votes on the two resolutions.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I adhere to my motion.

On the question of seconding the motion to suspend the rules—tellers were ordered, and Mr. G. F. HOAR and Mr. POTTER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 114, noes 79.

So the motion was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, Will the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolutions?

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that to save time the vote be taken by tellers.

Mr. POTTER. O, no; let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the demand for the yeas and nays is waived and the vote is taken by tellers, it will save a good deal of time.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS, and Mr. HALE of Maine, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to say that we shall vote against those resolutions only because of the second. We are not opposed to the first.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 86, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Hathorn, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Killinger, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phillips, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—155.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Pierce Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Schell, Sloss, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Biery, Burchard, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Duell, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Hynes, Kendall, Lamport, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Mitchell, Niles, Orr, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Perry, Phelps, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Ransier, James C. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Small, William A. Smith, Snyder, Alexander H. Stephens, Strawbridge, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, and Wolfe—46.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, said: On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PIKE; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I now move that the rules be so suspended as to submit to the House these two resolutions to be voted on separately. I do not think it will require a yea and nay vote on the first resolution.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] if adopted, would bring the two resolutions before the House for adoption or rejection, which question would be decided by a majority vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] would press his claims to the floor for the appropriation bills.

Mr. WOOD. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. It is that the rules be so suspended as to submit each of the resolutions to a separate vote.

Mr. WOOD. The vote to be first upon the first resolution and then upon the next?

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition.

Mr. SPEER. Would a majority vote be sufficient to pass the resolutions in each case?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. SPEER. Then I object to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am compelled to ask that I be recognized to go on with the appropriation bills. We have not the strength to go on with a two-thirds vote now.

Mr. POTTER. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts to be to bring the two resolutions before the House to be voted upon separately. To the first resolution there will be no objection. But I regard the second resolution as so absolutely revolutionary and dangerous that I must object to it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I think these resolutions are acquiesced in by the majority of both parties.

Mr. POTTER. Not both.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. And will give peace to the country.

Mr. POTTER. It will be the peace that cometh by the sword.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If you want the peace that cometh by the sword——

Mr. POTTER. That is all you ever succeed in bringing by Federal interference.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that if gentlemen will by unanimous consent allow a separate vote to be taken upon the resolutions, without calling the yeas and nays, I will waive my right to the floor to go on with the appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I must insist upon going on with the appropriation bills.

Mr. POTTER. Does the gentleman mean a separate vote on the two resolutions under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. GARFIELD. No.

Mr. POTTER. Then I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I must insist upon going on with the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] the chairman of the Committee on Elections, desires to submit to the House a proposition in regard to an amendment which he proposes to offer.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask that my proposition be submitted.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman desire the Chair to submit?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is that the House shall so suspend the rules as to give a separate vote on the two resolutions which I have offered. Is that objected to on the democratic side?

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS and others objected.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I move that the rules be so suspended as to bring the two resolutions before the House for a separate vote.

Mr. POTTER. I understand what that implies.

The SPEAKER. It implies just this: That if two-thirds of the House order it a majority vote will control the action of the House on each resolution.

Mr. POTTER. I understand that.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Have not this committee the right to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. RANDALL. They were raised when the President's message was referred.

The SPEAKER. And the right to report at any time has never been given them.

The motion to suspend the rules was then seconded.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let us have the yeas and nays on suspending the rules.

Mr. WOOD. Before putting the question to the House, I would like the Chair to state exactly the effect of this motion if carried. Is it that the majority can then pass each resolution separately?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. If the House shall make the order it will bring the resolutions directly before the House within the control of the majority.

Mr. CESSNA. Would it be in order for me to ask my friends on the other side if they are opposed to anything that the majority desires?

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order.

Mr. CESSNA. Then I will not make the inquiry.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the time of the House is to be taken up by the yeas and nays, I am willing to withdraw my motion.

Mr. TREMAIN. It has the moral effect now of a majority vote.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules having been seconded, it cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURROWS. I object to the withdrawal.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 85, not voting 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Young—85.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Beck, Biery, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Crutchfield, Curtis, Robert S. Hale, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Kendall, Lamar, Lamport, Lewis, Lofland, Mitchell, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Isaac W. Scudder, Small, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Strawbridge Charles R. Thomas, Charles W. Willard, and Wolfe—30.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BURCHARD. My colleague from Illinois, Mr. HAWLEY, is confined to his room by illness. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PIKE. If he were present he would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

After the last name on the roll was called several members voted "ay."

Mr. WOOD. Were these gentlemen now offering to vote within the bar when the last name on the roll was called?

The SPEAKER. On what information does the gentleman ask that question?

Mr. WOOD. I desire that the Chair shall put to them the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already in effect done so by making the general announcement which the rules require, that those offering to vote do so upon the assurance that they were within the bar when the last name on the roll was called. If the gentleman has no information to the effect that any of these gentlemen were not then within the bar, he has no right to raise the question.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions are now before the House.

The question being taken on the first resolution, it was agreed to.

The question recurring on agreeing to the second resolution,

Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 89, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Killinger, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—165.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Perry, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—89.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Biery, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Cook, Crounse, Crutchfield, Fort, Robert S. Hale, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Kendall, Lamport, Lewis, Lofland, Mitchell, Niles, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Phelps, Pike, Isaac W. Scudder, Small, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William B. Williams, and Wolfe—33.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call, the following announcements were made:

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PIKE. If he were present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. CESSNA. My colleagues, Mr. BIERY and Mr. STRAWBRIDGE, are both absent on account of severe illness. If they were present they would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. In making this motion I desire to say that I regret our friends on the other side have put themselves on the record against even allowing a proposition to give peace to Louisiana to be voted on by the Representatives of the American people.

Several members objected to debate.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPENSES OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be so far suspended that it may be in order at the time the sundry civil appropriation bill or the deficiency appropriation bill is under consideration in the Committee of the Whole, to move an amendment thereto to pay the expenditures in whole or in part of such parties to contested-election cases in the Forty-third Congress as the Committee on Elections may recommend.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question recurred on the suspension of the rules and the adoption of the resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 41.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLARD of Vermont, and Mr. SMITH of New York, were appointed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to have the law of the last Congress read on this subject.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I wish the House would give the committee five minutes for explanation.

The SPEAKER. The law prohibits the House making allowance to contestants. This is to make an appropriation by Congress, both branches concurring.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. How many men are to be paid under this resolution?

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 146, noes 23.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I demand the yeas and nays on the suspension of the rules and adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before moving to suspend the rules to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and proceed with the sundry civil appropriation bill, I report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriation to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, and move that the bill be printed and recommitted.

The bill was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted.

PETER WRIGHT AND SONS.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4852) to refund and remit certain duties to Peter Wright & Sons; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

SOUTHERN MARYLAND RAILROAD.

Mr. ARTHUR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, submitted a report, to accompany a bill (H. R. No. 4475) to aid in the construction of the Southern Maryland Railroad, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that that body had concurred in a resolution of the House that there be printed and bound in quarto form one thousand copies of each of volumes 2, 7, and 9 of the report of geological survey of the Territories for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

It further announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes.

It further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4734) to establish certain post-roads, with sundry amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4727) explanatory of the act passed June 20, 1874.

Mr. PENDLETON also, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 792) for the relief of John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Powell.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARSHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4441) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and to recommend concurrence therein.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for leave to print a few remarks of a general character on the Military Academy appropriation bill.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. (See Appendix.)

Mr. MARSHALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, with the recommendation that they be non-concurred in and a committee of conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I am directed to report back the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that some of the Senate amendments be concurred in and others non-concurred in.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Senate amendments and the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a suggestion. The Committee on Appropriations have carefully gone over the large number of amendments made by the Senate to the Indian Appropriation bill. They recommend concurrence in some, non-concurrence in others, and concurrence, with amendments in others. I ask the House to adopt the report of the committee, and send the amendments on which the recommendation is non-concurrence or concurrence with amendments to a conference committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. O, no. How can we concur in Senate amendments unless we know what they are. Let the amendments be read where the committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to make a statement in addition to what has been said by the chairman of the committee. All or nearly all of the amendments in which we recommend concurrence are amendments which do not increase the amount in the bill. But wherever the Senate amendments make any increase amounting tc anything the Committee on Appropriations has recommended non-concurrence. That has been the rule upon which we have acted.

Mr. CONGER. Has the Senate put in anything which was rejected by the House?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Nothing. None of those claims that were discussed here have been put in.

Mr. WOOD. Does the gentleman from Missouri state that in the Senate amendments in which concurrence is recommended there is no increase over the House bill?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I do not state that. But the increase is so trivial that it does not warrant us to take up time in considering it. Where there is any increase amounting to anything we non-concur.

Mr. WOOD. What is the increase in the Senate amendments?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The aggregate of increase by the Senate amendments is over $300,000. But as regards those amendments in which we recommend concurrence I believe—although I cannot just now state accurately the exact amount—it will not be over $10,000. The balance ($290,000) we non-concur in.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think everything in which the committee recommend concurrence should be read.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will make the motion suggested by the chairman of the committee, that the report of the Committee on Appropriations with reference to this bill be adopted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. PARKER. Then I move to suspend the rules and adopt the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—ayes 72, noes 52.

Mr. GARFIELD. As there is a large vote on the other side, I think my friend from Missouri had better withdraw his motion.

Mr. RANDALL. By an amendment adopted on my motion when the bill was in the House there was a limit put upon the manner of making contracts, and it was provided that every contract should be advertised except those that would amount to less than $300. The Senate have not struck out the language of my amendment, but they have made the limit $3,000 instead of $300. I understand the Committee on Appropriations have assented to that change. I want to say to the House that it is almost better that there was no amendment at all of that nature than to have it with the amount changed in that way. I hope the House will adhere to its action in this matter. We fully discussed the amendment at the time. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] who had charge of the bill assented to it. If the amendment of the Senate be adopted it will allow those who make these purchases to run wild and buy in every direction without the restraint of any contract or advertisement.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I deem it just to the House to state that I think my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] forgot to say the committee have added one item of $300,000 to the bill on the recommendation of the President, which I think is right.

Mr. DAWES. What is that?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The Army have captured three thousand of the wild Cheyenne Indians, and hold them as prisoners of war at Fort Sill. The President recommended an appropriation to keep those Indians under the control of the Army, and by that means thinks he can secure a permanent peace in that portion of the country. The $300,000 is for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you propose then to pass an appropriation of $300,000 without any consideration whatever by the House?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I withdraw the motion.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Senate amendments and the recommendations of the committee in regard to them. The recommendations of the committee were agreed to without debate, except in the following cases.

The fifty-second amendment of the Senate was as follows:

After line 1697 insert these words:
That the Pi-Ute reservation in Southeastern Nevada is hereby abolished.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not concur in that and abolish that reservation, as the Senate has suggested?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. We want to discuss it in the committee of conference.

Mr. RANDALL. When the Senate want to abolish a reservation I do not see why the House should not concur.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. This was new matter that came before the Senate; we had not time to investigate it. Some information has come to us since that will enable us probably to concur with the Senate in the committee of conference.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The sixty-second amendment of the Senate was as follows:

Insert these words:
For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expenses of the commission of citizens serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, $15,000.

The committee recommended concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will not concur in that amendment. It provides, so far as I can understand it, a salary for the peace commissioners.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. It does not provide for their salary. They serve without pay. It provides for their expenses.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; it provides for their expenses. They are to serve for one year more, is it not? I believe that the usefulness of that board has departed; and I think that the law abolishing the board should be allowed to take effect, so far as we are able to have it take effect, immediately. There is no necessity for providing $15,000 to cover their expenses, when by the repeal of the act which organized that board we have in effect admitted their further uselessness. I hope that the Congress of the United States, having abolished it, will now save to the Government the $15,000 which the Senate have put in to cover the expenses of a board which we say should not have any existence.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I omitted to state that there was a report in connection with the deficiency appropriation bill, which I now ask to have printed.

There was no objection, and the printing of the report was ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Senate amendments to the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I think if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had fully investigated this subject he would not have come to the conclusion that he has come to now. One of the principal duties performed by the present board, as it was also performed by the previous board, is in aiding the Committee on Indian Affairs in the purchase of supplies of goods for the different Indian tribes. For the present fiscal year the purchase, if I remember aright, of these goods was made in the months of May or June last. I know that it has been asserted frequently upon this floor and in the newspapers of the country that the Indian Department, with the assistance of this board, is paying largely more than is being paid by Army officers for a like class of supplies.

Now, I hold in my hand a comparative statement showing that that is an entire mistake, and that on the contrary the Indian Department, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, with the aid, advice, and assistance of this board, have been purchasing supplies at much less rates than those furnished to the Army. His statement shows that at Omaha the officers of the Army paid for corn per bushel 69, 71½, 72⅝, and 98⅞ cents, while the Indian Department paid only 59 cents at the same time or during the same year. That was the difference in the cost of their purchases of corn; I do not care whether it was at the same time or not. It was the duty of the officers of the Army to take advantage of a low market as it was the duty of the Indian officers. Whether they got it in consequence of the variation of prices at different periods I do not know, but I do know that they got it cheaper than did the officers of the Army.

Now take the question of beef. In the Department of Arizona the Army people paid for one hundred, gross, $6.19½ and $6.62, while the officers of the Indian Department paid only for beef per one hundred, gross, $2.69; less, far less than one-half and only a little more than one-third of what the Army officers paid in Arizona. The Delegate who represents that Territory [Mr. MCCORMICK] knows this to be the fact. For Camp Supply the Army officers paid $3.54½ per one hundred, gross, while the Indian people paid only $1.64. At the Spotted Tail agency the Army officers paid $4.62½ and $4.69½ while the officers of the Indian Department paid only $2.30. At Fort Hall, in Idaho, the Army people paid $5 per hundred, gross, while the officers of the Indian Department paid only $3.40. At Fort Sill, in Indian Territory, the Army officers paid $2.67½ per hundred, gross, while the Indian Department officers paid only $1.64, about one-half. At Fort Sully, in Dakota Territory, the Army officers paid $3.74 per one hundred, gross, while the officers of the Indian Department paid only $2.30. And so it was all the way through.

Now the superintendence of the purchase of the supplies was had by this commission, and I may assert, without taking the time of the House to show it, that of all the supplies purchased in New York and other cities they range from 10 to 35 per cent. last year, under the direction of the peace commission, cheaper than they ever did before.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a valuable statement, I have no doubt; but the gentleman does not speak definitely as to what the peace commission had to do with these contracts.

Now I wish to say to the gentleman and to the House that this peace commission as originally organized met with the confidence of the country, and had its confidence to an unlimited extent, and that when those men were thwarted at every step of reform by the Secretary of the Interior and by other governmental officers they were practically driven from their places.

I do not want to criticise at length the character of the men who have been substituted on that board; but I do say this much here, that the day of their usefulness has gone by, and Congress has determined that the board shall be abolished, and has abolished it a year hence. And now you ask for $15,000 to cover the expenses of a board which you have determined to be of no use. I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will non-concur in the amendment of the Senate and save this amount of money to the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the previous question on the pending amendment.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope the appropriation for this commission will not be rejected.

Mr. RANDALL. You have already abolished the board a year hence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 73, noes 49.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. RANDALL said: I ask for the yeas and nays. I have no idea of continuing this board by indirection.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 42 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that this and all the rest of the amendments be non-concurred in; that will save time.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we had better test the sense of the House upon this one.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. What more can you have than a non-concurrence?

Mr. RANDALL. If the committee of conference will consider it as instructions to them from the House——

Mr. GARFIELD. They cannot consider it any instruction.

Mr. RANDALL. Then let the vote go on.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 75, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Carpenter, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Hathorn, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lawrence, Lawson, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phillips, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Strait, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Whiteley, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodworth—144.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, DeWitt, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Finck, Fort, Giddings, Glover, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Magee, Marshall, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Schell, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Beck, Berry, Biery, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cason, Caulfield, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Corwin, Cotton, Davis, Eldredge, Foster, Gunter, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Howe, Hunter, Hurlbut, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamport, Lewis, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McKee, McLean, Merriam, Mitchell, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, Pelham, Phelps, Pike, Potter, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Small, George L. Smith, Snyder' Alexander H. Stephens, Storm, Stowell, Strawbridge, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas. Wells, Wheeler, White, Wilber, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—68,

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked was the eightieth amendment, to strike out "$300" and insert $3,000," so that it would read "that hereafter no purchase of goods, supplies, or farming implements, or any other article whatsoever, the cost of which shall exceed $3,000, shall be paid for from the money appropriated by this act, unless the same shall have been previously advertised and contracted for as heretofore provided by law."

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to concur in the amendment, with an amendment to make it $1,000 instead of $3,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next and last amendment upon which a separate vote was asked was the eighty-third amendment, to insert the following:

Each Indian agent shall keep a book of itemized expenditures of every kind, with a record of all contracts, together with the receipts of money from all sources; and the books thus kept shall always be open to inspection; and the said books shall remain in the office at the respective reservations, not to be removed from said reservation by said agent, but shall be safely kept and handed over to his successor; and true transcripts of all entries of every character in said books shall be forwarded quarterly by each agent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: Provided, That should any agent knowingly make any false entry in said books or in the transcripts directed to be forwarded to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or shall knowingly fail to keep a perfect entry in said books as herein prescribed, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any United States court having jurisdiction of such offense, shall be fined in a sum not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, at the discretion of the court, and shall be rendered incompetent to hold said office of Indian agent after conviction under this act.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence in the amendment, with an amendment as follows: After the word "inspection," in line 5 of said amendment, add the words "to any officer of the United States Government," and strike out all after the word "successor," in line 8 of said amendment, down to and including the word "affairs," in line 11.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. This amendment, recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, is to allow these books to be kept open to inspection by any officer of the United States; and it strikes out the clause requiring transcripts to be forwarded quarterly by each agent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as they already do it now and it is unnecessary to forward two transcripts.

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment in either case is a good one.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that a committee of conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill. Before doing that I will yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MACDOUGALL,] who desires to have made in order an amendment to the bill.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the sundry civil appropriation bill shall be considered in Committee of the Whole it shall be in order to offer an amendment to pay the State lunatic asylum for insane convicts at Auburn, in New York, for the keeping of insane United States convicts after the term of sentence had expired, $5,900.46, the same having been recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

No objection was made, and the resolution was adopted.

SAMUEL W. CRAWFORD.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I rise to submit a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with amendments as follows:

In the fourteenth line, after the word "action," add the words "and every such officer now borne on the retired list shall be continued thereon, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2, chapter 38, act of March 30, 1868;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Also, in the seventeenth line, after the words "arm or leg," add the words "or has an arm or leg permanently disabled by reason of resection on account of wounds;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Also, in the eighteenth line, after the word "battle," add the words "And be it also provided, That no retired officer shall be affected by this act who has been retired or may hereafter be retired on the rank held by him at the time of his retirement;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate by which the title was amended, and agree to the same.

CHAS. ALBRIGHT,
C. D. MACDOUGALL,
P. M. B. YOUNG,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
GEO. E. SPENCER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. For the purpose of correcting an error in the report, I ask that the following resolution may be adopted:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the engrossing clerk be instructed to correct a clerical error in the report of the conference committee on House bill No. 2093, by transferring the first amendment proposed to section 2, after the words "wounds received in action," in the fourteenth line, so that it will come after the words, "when received in battle," in the eighteenth line.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ALBRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON MINING STATISTICS.

Mr. DONNAN. I rise to a privileged report, and submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution providing for the publication of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment; that all of the concurrent resolution after the word "printed" be stricken out; and that the following be inserted: "of the report for 1873 twenty-five hundred copies for the use of the House, one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five hundred copies for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury and of Commissioner Raymond; and of the report for 1874 twenty-five hundred copies for the use of the House, one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five hundred copies for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury and of Commissioner Raymond."

And the House agree to the same.

W. G. DONNAN,
CHAS. CLAYTON,
A. M. WADDELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. B. ANTHONY,
TIM. O. HOWE,
ELI SAULSBURY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

JAMES A. GARFIELD,
I. C. PARKER,
R. M. SPEER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The committee of conference direct me to state that they have failed to agree on a single matter—the question in regard to the salaries of the clerks at our desk. We leave it to the House to take whatever action it may choose in regard to the matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment which causes this trouble in regard to the salary of clerks of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course it is not proper for me to reflect upon the action of the other branch of Congress; but I wish to say that so long as I have been a member here this House has conceded to the Senate the right of fixing the number and compensation of its own officers, while we have claimed the same authority for this body. In my judgment the House cannot in self-respect yield this right.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the gentleman think, as a constitutional question——

Mr. RANDALL. I am not arguing any constitutional question. I am only maintaining that by the comity and courtesy which should be recognized between the two Houses we have this right.

Mr. HOLMAN. My motion is that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate on this subject.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. This House in the first instance, while acting upon this question in Committee of the Whole, concurred in the amendment of the Senate in regard to the pay of our own clerks and non-concurred in the Senate amendment increasing the salaries of certain clerks of that body. Afterward, however, the House reconsidered its action and non-concurred in the Senate amendment in regard to the salary of House clerks. Since then, as I understand, the Senate is willing to recede from its amendment increasing the pay of its own clerks; and the point of difference is that on the other hand this House, as represented by its conferees, is not willing to act upon the same principle by receding from its disagreement with regard to the pay of clerks in this House.

Not simply as a matter of policy in adjusting an important bill, but as a duty which this House owes to itself, (the salary-increasing features of the act of March 3, 1873, having been repealed so far as they could be,) we should not, I submit, abandon at this early moment the ground we then assumed and begin the process of increasing these clerical salaries. I insist that the House should concur in the amendment of the Senate; and even that places these salaries at figures which are, in my judgment, beyond what they should be.

Mr. RANDALL. When speaking upon this subject a few minutes ago I spoke only as to the propriety of this House having control of its own officers. Now, this action of the House to which the Senate has disagreed is not an increase of salary. The law a year ago fixed these salaries, and the recent action of the House proposed to keep these salaries where they had been fixed. The Senate has proposed to cut them down below the figures fixed by the law passed a year ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the gentleman now insisting that the salaries of these clerks shall be put at the same amount at which they were fixed in the act of March 3, 1873, the very law which we were compelled by a strong popular sentiment to repeal.

Mr. RANDALL. I am for keeping the salaries where they were fixed a year ago by law. The Senate demands, against our protest, that we shall agree to cut down the salaries of our officers and leave theirs where they are.

Mr. GARFIELD. This second committee of conference on the part of the House has faithfully and earnestly represented the views of this body. We have urged in our conference with the representatives of the Senate that the clerks at the desk in this House have a great deal harder work to do than any corresponding officers at the other end of the Capitol. The Senate conferees, on the other hand, urged that the Senate last year only consented to the amount then appropriated for these officers because it was on the last day of the session; and that at the same time notice was given that they would not consent to these salaries unless there should be some adjustment of salaries as between the two Houses.

Mr. RANDALL. That I deny.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say that two conference committees have tried faithfully to carry out the views of the House upon this question. I believe that every member of the conference committee on our side is satisfied that we have done all we could. The House has now one of two things to do, either to discharge us and appoint a new conference committee to go over again the whole bill, or adopt the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to recede from our disagreement to the amendment of the Senate upon this particular point, which would doubtless bring about a speedy agreement of the two Houses upon the bill.

Mr. KASSON. If we recede on the part of the House what then will be the relative pay of the officers of the two Houses?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say this: There is no law adjusting the relation between the pay of the two Houses. The Chief Clerk of the Senate gets $4,000 a year, which is higher than our officers get, but the clerks of some of the lower grades in the Senate get less than ours. The Senate conferees insist their clerks on the whole are getting less than ours. We deny that. The Senate proposes this shall be done: We shall put in this amendment a clause making it the law that the Speaker of the next House and the Vice-President of the next Congress shall appoint a joint committee of the two Houses immediately on the first day of the next session to take up the whole question of the relative pay of the two Houses and report a bill adjusting it. That they offer in place of what we are insisting on. We are willing to take that if they will allow our officers to remain at the present pay, but they will not accept that. That is the whole case. I believe I will now demand the previous question.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to state to the House, as one member of the committee, that as a matter of principle I believe the pay as fixed by the House last year, and the pay as fixed by the House on the amendment in question, is not too much. I believe there is no one in this House who has more responsible duties or does more labor than these gentlemen who are included in this proposition. Then, as a matter of principle and as a matter of justice, I believe in adhering to the position of the House on this question.

Again, let me say to my republican friends that it is a matter of somewhat delicate character for republicans in this House, when they one year ago said their men should be paid a certain salary and when we are going out of power here, to say to the incoming majority because you are not of us your men shall not be paid as much as ours. That of course is not the motive of any man who will cast a vote on this question, but it might be construed in that way, and I do not believe we should give any opportunity for any such construction. I believe we have a reasonable right to presume that the clerks of the next House will be as faithful and as honest as the clerks of our House, whose pay we have fixed at the amount settled upon last year.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say a single word. I do not wish to imperil this bill if that is likely to be the result by the vote to recede which shall fail to be carried by the House. I ask the gentleman from Ohio if it cannot be arranged by appointing a new conference committee on the understanding on the part of the House they shall make an effort to equalize the pay of the two Houses, receding from a part of our amendment if it is necessary. I prefer that course to be taken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would rather not be on any further committee of conference.

Mr. ARCHER. Let me say a word. Now, Mr. Speaker, the pay of the Chief Clerk of the Senate is $4,000 a year. The pay of the clerks we propose to stand to on this bill is $3,000 a year, and they wish to cut it down to $2,592. We were perfectly willing—that is, the conference committee on which I was—that the Senate should judge of the services of its own employés, and we insisted that it was a matter of comity we should judge of the services of the clerks of this House. They now pay their Clerk $4,000 a year, with one-third of the members and one-third of the work to do the employés of this House do.

Mr. KASSON. What would be the objection to a new conference committee with the understanding I have stated?

Mr. ARCHER. But you will never get the conferees of the Senate to agree to cut down the pay of their officers.

Mr. KASSON. Let the committee be free.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the committee be free from that or any instruction on the part of the House.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. No; let us have the instruction of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the men who are to fill the places in this Hall from the 4th of March next come here upon the most solemn pledges to reduce the salaries of the employés of this Government. The democratic party, to the extent of a majority of this House at the next session, are bound to follow that promise. We have here now the power to carry out our pledge; and I repudiate and denounce, so far as the democratic party is concerned, any argument here, I do not care how specious it may be or under what pretense it may be founded, in favor of keeping up these salaries. Here are salaries of eight or nine hundred dollars a month during this last year and during this short session of Congress.

Mr. ARCHER rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not yield. We have salaries of eight or nine hundred dollars a month for clerical hire where, when the clerk has performed his duties during this short session, he retires from these Halls and engages in any other pursuit he may think proper. With these enormous salaries now being paid, with this side of the House so solemnly committed to cut down salaries, to resort to subterfuge upon any pretense whatever in order to keep up these high salaries over which we have absolute control is as discreditable as anything which gentlemen upon this floor could be guilty of.

We are not responsible for the action of the Senate. They have not seen fit, it seems, to reduce the salaries of their own officers; but we are responsible for the salaries which are under our control. And I warn gentlemen on this side of the House that if the utterances which have been made here are to be regarded as the utterances which are to come from this side of this Hall when Congress shall again assemble, there will be a voice louder and deeper than has ever been heard that will admonish Representatives that their pledges shall be fulfilled.

Mr. ARCHER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I believe does not intend to be unfair in his statement. But he intimates that these gentlemen sit here only three months and get $800 a month for that time. Now, it is known to every man who frequents Washington that these men are here fulfilling the duties of their offices in the different rooms of the Capitol during the vacation. I am here almost every week during vacation time, and I never came here that I have not found these gentlemen in the Capitol and at work.

I think it is due to the dignity of this body that when the Senate fixes the salaries of its officers who do one-third of the work at a higher rate than those of our officers, we should refuse to assent to any such thing.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say a word in answer to the gentleman from Indiana. The Chair had the kindness to put me on this second conference without desire or wish of my own, and in discharging the duties of the position I endeavored to carry out what was the expressed will of the House. And in doing so I think I have not subjected myself to the discourteous and unjust language—not to characterize it more severely—of the gentleman from Indiana.

I have attempted no subterfuge and have attempted no trick. I have the courage when I believe a man earns his money to say so; and that is a virtue which the gentleman from Indiana, with all his virtues, does not possess.

There are six employés of the House whose salaries are involved in this disagreement. Two of them under the law now get $3,600, the other four $3,000. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says that Congress was compelled to repeal the law increasing salaries. So it was; but after it had repealed the law increasing salaries it voluntarily restored the increase to these six officers of the House.

Congress felt that they should be excepted from the repeal, and for a just reason. The membership of the House had been increased forty or fifty, and a corresponding increase of duty resulted to these employés. There was reason, therefore, in the action of Congress restoring the increase of their salaries after it had repealed the increase of salaries generally.

The conferees on the part of the House endeavored not to increase salaries but to keep the salaries of these six employés where they are now by law; and I ask the majority whether as they leave this House they will consent to act unfairly to these officers. They may be succeeded in the next House by gentlemen of different politics, but that consideration does not change the duties of their respective positions and should not lead to a reduction of the compensation now authorized by law.

The question being taken on receding from the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendments, there were ayes 22, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this question of increasing salaries I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not an increase of salaries.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 10; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the House refused to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, will the House request a new conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to ask for a new conference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as managers of the new conference on the part of the House Mr. PARKER of Missouri, Mr. FORT of Illinois, and Mr. RANDALL of Pennsylvania.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) to provide for the preservation of the manuscript returns of the first and ninth censuses.

An act (S. No. 320) fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States;

An act (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870, and to provide for repayment of certain moneys paid to officers mustered out of the Army as supernumerary but subsequently reappointed by the President;

An act (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes, for hearing therein, and in cases of habeas corpus; and

An act (S. No. 958) for the relief of J. E. D. Couzins, of Saint Louis.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3511) regulating the removal of causes from State courts to the circuit courts of the United States, with Senate amendments, and moved that the House request a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question being taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the sundry civil appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose the amendment pending was the one which will now be read by the Clerk:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 31, line 732, add the following:

For expenses of the suit to be instituted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to recover certain lands, and the rents and profits thereof, known as the Rancho Panoche Grande, in California, as provided in the resolution No. 142, passed by the House of Representatives on the 26th of January, 1875, $5,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to renew the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I modify my amendment so as to obviate the point of order and I offer it now in this shape:

To enable and authorize the Department of Justice to aid the Commissioner of the General Land Office to recover certain lands, and the rents and profits thereof, known as the Rancho Panoche Grande, in California, as provided in the resolution No. 142, passed by the House of Representatives on the 26th of January, 1875, $5,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a clause in the Revised Statutes, being section 365. It is as follows:

No compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any person besides the respective district attorneys and assistant district attorneys for services as attorney or counselor to the United States or to any branch or department of the Government thereof, except in cases specially authorized by law, and then only on the certificate of the Attorney-General that such services were actually rendered and that the same could not be performed by the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General or the officers of the Department of Justice or by the district attorneys.

Now here is a proposition specially to authorize by law a suit in a case and it requires a special authorization by law before such a thing can be done. The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be the only law authorizing this thing if it is passed. I call the attention of the Chair to the section from the Revised Statutes which I have read, as well as to section 189 of the Revised Statutes, as the ground on which the point of order rests against this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That might be a very good point against the amendment as it was originally offered, but the amendment as modified is to authorize and enable the Department of Justice to do this in aid of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I drew the amendment with both those sections of the Revised Statutes before me.

Mr. GARFIELD. But there is nothing now in the law that authorizes a suit of the kind the gentleman proposes to have brought, unless the proposition of the gentleman, here introduced, be agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; there is nothing in the law to authorize any suit to be brought.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's amendment refers to a suit authorized by a resolution of the House. Of course, if the amendment be put in here and if it become a law, it will be the only law in reference to that suit.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is there no law now authorizing the Department of Justice to sue for United States lands? Because, if there is not there ought to be.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is not, or the gentleman would not have to make one.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I am not making one.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have already passed an appropriation of $3,000,000 in the judiciary section covering the expenses of all the courts for carrying out all the laws. I now ask for the reading of section 189 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

No head of a Department shall employ attorneys or counsel at the expense of the United States; but when in need of counsel or advice shall call upon the Department of Justice, the office of which shall attend to the same.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask now that section 365 be again read.

The Clerk again read section 365.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The Chair will see that this amendment simply authorizes the Department of Justice to do what they have a right to do and gives them the means with which to do it.

Mr. PAGE. The section which has been read says that no appropriation shall be made for this purpose except at the request of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means; I have read the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say before making a ruling upon this point that from the wording of the amendment it is entirely impossible, if this appropriation is made, for any portion of it to be used unless it is used under the authority and by the direction of the Department of Justice. It cannot be used by any other Department, and the Chair hardly feels himself justified under the law to rule out the amendment and will rule it in order as modified.

Mr. PAGE. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the first section of the mining act of 1866.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the mineral lands of the public domain, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and occupation by all citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become citizens, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and subject also to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same may not be in conflict with the laws of the United States.

Mr. PAGE. I now ask the Clerk to read the first section of the mining act of 1872:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase, by citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

Mr. PAGE. It will be seen that in 1866 the Congress of the United States passed an act declaring all the mineral lands within the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, open to exploration and occupation, but not to purchase.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By whom?

Mr. PAGE. By citizens of the United States or those who had declared their intention to become such. It will be understood that the act of 1866 did not permit any person to become the purchaser of any mineral lands. But by the act of July 10, 1872, it was declared that all the mineral lands in the United States were open to exploration and purchase. No law of Congress up to 1872 provided for the sale of mineral lands. These men having gone upon these lands, invited there by the Government of the United States by an act of Congress declaring the lands open to exploration and occupation, and by another act afterward declaring them open to purchase, it seems to me that this House will be going a great way if it shall make an appropriation of $5,000 to enable the Attorney-General or any other officer of the Government to commence suit against—I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts against whom he proposes to commence suit?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Against forty foreigners who do not belong to the United States, who have intruded upon the lands of the United States to the amount of some eight thousand acres, as I am informed, and who have taken from the lands of the United States property to the value of millions of dollars without right and without law.

Mr. PAGE. That will do. The gentleman says the object of this amendment is to deprive certain gentlemen not citizens of the United States of their right to mine upon the public lands. I never before knew what was the object of this amendment, or that it was to prevent those not citizens of the United States from mining upon the public lands. We have by a law of Congress invited every man who is a citizen, or who has declared his intention to become such, to go upon the public lands and explore them and purchase them and occupy them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And nobody else.

Mr. PAGE. You do not assert here that any of these men are not citizens of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes, I do.

Mr. PAGE. They have been upon the lands.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They never have been there in the world.

Mr. PAGE. There has been no question between the men who occupy these lands and the Government of the United States. The question has been raised whether Mr. McGarrahan owned the land or the United States owned it. But the Supreme Court, the Departments, and Congress have time and time again held that the title was in the Government of the United States. These men who are on the land do not deny that. If you authorize this suit to be commenced you will be merely making an appropriation for the United States to commence suit against the United States. There is no living man that denies the title of the United States to this land.

Mr. LAMAR. I cannot give this amendment my support without some further explanation of it at least. It seems to me that it assumes the existence of a suit pending somewhere between two private parties. The gentleman from Massachusetts shakes his head, in denial, I suppose. Very well. Then it is not proposed that the Government shall interfere between private litigants. If, then, it is one between the Government and a private party, I am of the opinion that the Government has already ample means for its prosecution. Nor do I see the necessity of a special resolution to authorize the Attorney-General to prosecute that suit. This House not long since voted over $3,000,000 for the Department of Justice. A member near me suggests that the Attorney-General cannot act, having been counsel in the case previous to holding his present office. While this might be a good reason for this officer's declining to appear in such a case, it does not seem to be any reason for appropriating $5,000 for the purpose of employing some one else. Unless it is charged that the Attorney-General is using his power to prevent a prosecution by the Government which it is his duty to institute, and that he is so acting by reason of his being or having been the attorney of the adverse party, I can see no necessity for this legislation. I do not understand the mover of this amendment [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts] to make so grave a charge against the Attorney-General. Sir, I know but little of the merits of the case to which this proposition refers; nothing, indeed, except what I have casually gathered from current discussions and the information derived from an excellent speech delivered by a gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Kerr,) who was a member of the last Congress, and will, I am glad to say, be a member of the next. I repeat, if this is to interfere between two private litigants, it is very improper legislation. If to prosecute a suit by Government in its own behalf, it is unnecessary legislation. My purpose in making these remarks is to elicit debate and more light on this subject. Unless some better reason is given for the amendment than I have yet heard, I shall vote against it. With a Department of Justice provided with $3,000,000, which I think is $1,000,000 too much, I am opposed to an additional appropriation of $5,000 to do that which the Government has already authority to do.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the other night, two weeks ago, under the lead of my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] we passed a resolution directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to employ counsel to prosecute a suit in regard to this property, thereby directing a subordinate officer of the Government to violate the express law of the land, a law which expressly prohibits any officer from employing private counsel and gives the employment of counsel wholly to the Department of Justice. I suppose it did not occur to members at the time that by that resolution one branch of Congress was asking an executive officer to violate the law. That extraordinary proceeding of my colleague, which attracted my attention very much at the time, is now followed by an attempt to make a special appropriation for the prosecution of this particular suit. We have just appropriated some $3,000,000 to the Department of Justice, and a very great clamor was raised in some sections of the House in regard to the amount of that appropriation, which some gentlemen considered too large.

I had supposed that the law required all suits in behalf of the United States to be conducted or prosecuted by the Department of Justice, and that we had made a liberal appropriation to enable that Department to do its duty. Now, unless some particular person is to be employed as counsel, or unless some individual has a particular private interest, I cannot see why we should be urged to single out this special suit of the United States and appropriate $5,000 for its prosecution any more than we should make a special appropriation for the next revenue suit in New York or the next proceeding against an illicit distillery in North Carolina. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the House about a month ago, under the lead, as my colleague [Mr. E. R. HOAR] says, of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, adopted a resolution on this subject which was authorized by that committee. That resolution, which the House agreed to by a vote of 128 to 5, was designed to meet this difficulty. There is in California a range of mountains filled with quicksilver; a company called the New Idria Mining Company, composed largely of foreigners, squatted upon that land and has held it for years, without warrant under any mining law. A man named McGarrahan claims title under an old Spanish grant, upon which, as I understand, there has been a decision against him more than once. But the question has been before the Judiciary Committee of this House five or six times; and what is very remarkable, more than one ex-Attorney-General of the United States has been before that committee to argue in favor of the New Idria Mining Company. We never could get up this case without finding an ex-Attorney-General of the United States arguing in favor of these wealthy capitalists; for (I quote from a well-known authority)—

There is always a great deal of delicacy where there is a large amount of money involved.

Mr. KELLOGG. Were not those Attorneys-General all in office before the present Administration?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; by no means. I wish I could say that they were.

Now, here are millions running to waste; and we propose simply that a suit shall be brought by the United States. Thus far we never could get it done. The matter has been a long time before the Department. Resolution after resolution has been passed; and now they say this resolution is to fail for want of funds.

Why have we passed this resolution? Because the present Attorney-General of the United States was, before being Attorney-General—I hope he will not be afterward—the counsel of the New Idria Mining Company, and he does not see fit, and very properly, to act in the case. He wanted special counsel employed, as he would not act, and his subordinates ought not to act under the circumstances. We tried to have special counsel authorized by our resolution, and now a legal quibble is set up. To remove that quibble we propose to appropriate the small sum of $5,000 to test the title of the United States.

Now, my friend from California [Mr. HOUGHTON] says that these men do not contest the title of the United States. If that be so, then when suit is brought against them all they have to do is to let it go by default, and then it need not cost the United States a dollar.

Mr. PAGE. Have not the New Idria Mining Company applied for a patent under the mining laws?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree that they have.

Mr. PAGE. Very well then——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Wait a moment. There are two answers to that. In the first place they cannot be entitled under our mining laws to more than three thousand feet; but they attempt to cover with their claim three thousand acres.

Mr. NEGLEY. Four thousand acres.

Mr. PAGE. They cannot do that under the laws; can they?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; we cannot get the law tested for some unexplained reason. Meanwhile millions are running to waste. This matter has been before Congress ever since I have been here; and we have never been able to get the question tested; there has always been something in the way. At last comes my colleague [Mr. E. R. HOAR;] and his trouble is about the addition of $5,000 to the $3,000,000 already appropriated for the expenses of the judiciary system, supposing that this is an addition.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a single question? I take it he does not refer to me as an ex-Attorney-General who ever appeared before his committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I move to amend——

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments already pending.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I move to amend by striking out the two last words.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition strikes me as one of the most extraordinary that I have ever heard proposed in Congress.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. HOUGHTON. In a moment. It is proposed here to make an appropriation of money—for what purpose? Why, as the gentleman from Massachusetts declares, for the purpose of instituting an action against the New Idria Mining Company. Now, I have always understood that before any action could be instituted against anybody it was necessary that there should be some matter of controversy between the parties.

One McGarrahan has been seeking for years to assert a title to this property now possessed by the New Idria Mining Company. He has failed in the courts of the United States, he has failed before Congress, he has failed before the courts of California to establish his title. These various tribunals have all declared that he is not entitled to this property. The New Idria Mining Company during all this time have been contesting the claim before these tribunals and before Congress, asserting that McGarrahan has no right to the property. They have expended their money in what? In asserting the title of the United States to this property, and they have succeeded after years of litigation in establishing what they claim, that the United States is the owner of these mines. Now it is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts to appropriate money to institute an action in the name of the United States against these parties, who have for years been defending the title of the United States. Instead of asserting title against the United States, they are asserting the title in it.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question? I do not understand this controversy fully and wish to be informed in regard to some points. I have been informed that the New Idria Mining Company is now in possession of a much larger amount than it can rightfully claim, that it is encroaching largely upon the territory of the United States. They are entitled to three thousand feet, and I am told they have possession of more than three thousand acres. If that be so, it is a matter which ought to be investigated in some way.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I do not understand the New Idria Company have possession of any more land than they are entitled to under the law of 1872.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand that they have more than four thousand acres.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman from California how much they claim patents for?

Mr. HOUGHTON. I do not know.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. About how much?

Mr. HOUGHTON. Their claim is pending before the proper Department to acquire proper title to this property under the laws of the United States, the same laws precisely which apply to all other parties seeking to obtain patents for mineral lands.

Mr. NIBLACK. Was not the present Attorney-General one of the attorneys for the New Idria Company?

Mr. HOUGHTON. I have not heard.

Mr. NIBLACK. Has he not been attorney for the New Idria Mining Company?

Mr. HOUGHTON. Not that I ever heard of. I myself have been counsel for the New Idria Mining Company in some of the litigation with McGarrahan. The purpose of that litigation has been to defeat the claim of McGarrahan against the United States, and to establish the title of the United States to this property, which that litigation has resulted in establishing.

Mr. RANDALL. You may be an attorney in trying to establish the title of the New Idria Mining Company against the United States, as you have been an attorney against McGarrahan for the New Idria Mining Company. Now, for one, I think there ought to be a great delicacy in gentlemen who have been counsel for this New Idria Mining Company getting up here and advising us what to do.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Let me say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I should like to reply to the insinuations against me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not insinuate; you said so yourself.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I did say so.

Mr. RANDALL. You said that you were employed as an attorney to defend this New Idria Mining Company.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I was employed to defend the title of the United States against the title of McGarrahan.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Nobody but the Department of Justice can defend the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

Mr. TREMAIN. I take the floor, and give my time to the gentleman from California on a personal matter.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I do not know but I have said all I desire to.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, as to the merits of this controversy as between the New Idria Mining Company and McGarrahan I know nothing whatever, other than what I learned before I was a member of this House from the current history of the country; but I have a recollection—and if I am not correct some of the gentlemen who are sitting about me will correct me—I have a recollection that there has been a contest in the past with reference to the question whether the patents for these lands should be issued to McGarrahan or to this New Idria Mining Company, and I apprehend when my friend on my right from California [Mr. HOUGHTON] was defending the interest of the United States for the New Idria Mining Company as against McGarrahan it was for the purpose of defeating the right of McGarrahan to this claim to the end that the New Idria Mining Company might secure the patents.

Mr. PAGE. From whom?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. From the United States; as a matter of course, the United States. The interest of the New Idria Mining Company in defending against McGarrahan was to the end that it might establish the title to the property in the United States for no other purpose than that the New Idria Mining Company should receive these patents. I have another recollection in regard to this, with reference to which some gentleman may correct me if I am mistaken, and that is that during this present Administration there was a determination to issue these patents to this New Idria Mining Company, and finally a peremptory order went from the President of the United States that his name should not be put to any such patent, and in consequence of that the Secretary of the Interior went out of office. If that is not correct let some gentleman say wherein it is incorrect.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do you refer to Secretary Cox?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do.

Mr. GARFIELD. On the contrary, Secretary Cox's action has been wholly and absolutely sustained not only by the President but by his successor in office. The report of the Secretary of the Interior, the successor of Secretary Cox, after he went over the whole ground, affirmed the action of Secretary Cox.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I only speak from my recollection in regard to this matter. It is certainly true there was a controversy as to whether the patent should be given to the New Idria Mining Company or to McGarrahan.

I say from what I have learned that gentlemen who have investigated this question thoroughly, lawyers for whose opinion I have the highest regard, say that neither of these parties is entitled to this land, and it is because I believe that neither of these parties is entitled to this land that I insist upon it that, on account of the circumstances by which this thing is surrounded, it is the duty of this House and it is the duty of the officers of this Government to have an adjudication by the highest courts of the country to determine this question. And for that reason in the committee and in the House I have insisted that the necessary proceedings shall be instituted by somebody connected with the administration of the affairs of this Government that will determine the question whether these parties are entitled to this property or not, and if they are not entitled to it, that these patents shall not be issued.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If I have any time left I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. PAGE. Do you consider it necessary to appropriate $5,000 to prevent the proper officers of this Government who have this matter in charge from issuing the patent to this company, who have not complied with the law and for more land than they are entitled to? If the House has not confidence in the Secretary of the Interior that he will refuse a patent for a greater quantity of land than parties are entitled to under the law it would be better to put him out of office.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer what I send to the desk as an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no suit shall be commenced by virtue of this provision, or prosecuted, except under the control and direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, and no special counsel shall be employed unless by his assent and direction.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That is what I understand to be the law now, and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to me a reflection upon the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If what the gentleman says is true, the Attorney-General ought to be impeached, if he would be influenced by the fact that he had been an attorney.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; let me repeat what I did say. I simply said that the Attorney-General of the United States before he was Attorney-General was counsel for this company, and that it was manifestly impossible for him about this very matter to undertake to sue these parties on behalf of the United States.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. How does the House know the fact that the Attorney-General was attorney in this case? I do not know it. The gentleman from Massachusetts has no right to get up and say that.

I will modify my amendment by saying "Department of Justice" instead of "Attorney-General."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is what the resolution says.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. No; it says the Commissioner of the General Land Office. This, sir, is no more nor less than an attempt to get a lawyer for a claimant, Mr. McGarrahan, who has been lobbying around the doors of this House and of the Judiciary Committee room all this winter, and from whom and in whose interest this amendment comes.

The gentleman from Massachusetts talks about foreigners being interested in the New Idria mine. Well, sir, if foreigners are interested, they have the same rights that the gentleman has or any other citizen under the laws of the country.

I know some of the men interested in this mine who were born in this country, have lived in it as long as the gentleman from Massachusetts has, and are as good men as he; industrious, honest men; and we have no right, sir, to legislate in this special way against their interests. Such legislation is invidious in its character.

In relation to this New Idria mine and the claim of Mr. McGarrahan, I hold in my hands the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Secretary of the Interior vs. McGarrahan, 9 Wallace, p. 308.

After stating the case fully the court say:

> Founded, as this case is, upon a claim for land, which has been three times under examination in this court before the present writ of error was sued out, it is deemed necessary and proper to advert to the views expressed by the court on those occasions in respect to the validity of the claim and the means adopted to procure its confirmation.
>
> Subsequently the case was heard upon the merits, and the court held that the claim was invalid and fraudulent, and reversed the decree of the district court and remanded the cause with directions to dismiss the petition.

This case of McGarrahan was thus before the Supreme Court of the United States four times, and was declared by that court, after full consideration on the merits, to be fraudulent and void.

And we are now asked to take the case up and furnish a lawyer to help a private litigant who has thus been by the Supreme Court declared to have a fraudulent case.

If we do this it will, in my opinion, be a disgrace to this House and to the legislation of the country, in that it attempts to interfere between private litigants and prejudice the rights of private citizens.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the amendment and the amendment to the amendment be again reported.

The amendment and the amendment to the amendment were again read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have had occasion to investigate this Panoche Grande matter very considerably since I have been in Congress. It was presented here in the Thirty-eighth Congress, if I am not mistaken, and it has been the subject of investigation from that time until now by the Judiciary Committee; and the members of every Judiciary Committee since the claim was first presented have had no difficulty in determining that the New Idria Mining Company had no title to this ranch. Whatever individuals may have concluded with reference to the title to this property, they have, as far as I have understood them, determined that this mining company had no title.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I cannot let the gentleman interrupt me and use up my five minutes. He has just given the House his opinion.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman does not correctly state the facts. He was a member of the Fortieth Congress, in which the Judiciary Committee decided the reverse of what he says.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I say that in every instance the Judiciary Committee, as far as I know, and I think I understand what they did, came to the conclusion that the New Idria Mining Company had no title to the Panoche Grande. The Panoche Grande consists of four thousand acres or more of land. I do not now remember the number of acres. The New Idria Company and no member of it can enter more than three thousand feet under our mining law.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Fifteen hundred feet.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My friend from California says fifteen hundred feet. They cannot enter more than fifteen hundred feet, then, provided they bring themselves under the provisions of the law and comply with its provisions.

Now, I say to this House that at least four-fifths of all the claimants of this land—the members of the New Idria Mining Company—are foreigners, and foreigners under the mining laws cannot enter and obtain title under our laws to such lands.

My own conviction has been, after the most thorough investigation of this claim, that this man McGarrahan, of whom so much is said and who has been so much reviled, has as honest a title, as bona fide a right to the whole Panoche Grande Rauche as I have to my house and lot, which at least is undisputed. But this proposition must be true: that it either belongs to him or it belongs to the United States. Now, why is it that gentlemen object to having an investigation made to see who does own the land, and why do they object to having special counsel employed when it is suggested to the House and undenied by anybody, as far as I am informed, that the present Attorney-General has at some time in some way professionally been interested in this claim, so that it would seem to be improper to expect of him to prosecute it as it ought to be prosecuted? Why should we not make this small appropriation and have the matter investigated and see who owns the land? It is a vast country, an immense claim, and this company has been for years taking out millions and millions of quicksilver and accounting to nobody for it. Two hundred thousand dollars of the money of the United States has been used to prevent McGarrahan from getting a title as against the New Idria Company, and the officers of the United States have been employed, or have at all events been acting in concert for that purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in ten minutes.

A MEMBER. Say five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; I will say ten minutes; I wish a few moments myself.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But the gentleman is not going to close the debate?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose I have a right to close it; I have said nothing on the subject yet.

The question was taken on the motion to close debate in ten minutes, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole; and being taken, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate upon the pending amendment will be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he proposes that both sides shall be heard in the five minutes, or is he going to allow all the time to one side?

Mr. GARFIELD. The debate is allowed for ten minutes.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, I think some confusion about this question exists in the committee from our not generally understanding the provisions of the mining laws. By the mining laws of the United States any person who prospects upon lands of the United States and finds mineral is, under certain regulations, allowed to claim and take out that mineral for himself.

Now, without reference to the title to this land, but assuming it to be public land, this New Idria Company, or whoever may be in possession, is entitled by virtue of these general laws to take out the mineral from the lands they occupy. If they are occupying a larger amount of public land than they are entitled to under the mining law and are taking out mineral over a greater surface than that law allows, then other persons are at liberty to come in and claim possession of such excess and contest their right. As regards this mine there is not any question of the title of the United States involved excepting so far as McGarrahan has raised the question of title. But for him, these lands would be conceded to be lands of the United States. That no one but McGarrahan disputes. But McGarrahan claims that he had an old Spanish grant under which he is entitled to claim these lands. He went before the Secretary of the Interior upon this grant and his claim was decided against him. He then went before the courts of the United States, and his claim was in the Supreme Court decided adversely. He went then again to the courts of California, and during this very session the courts of California have declared his claim fraudulent and void. His right has been much considered in this House within the last few years, and the Judiciary Committee has been greatly divided concerning it. I myself believe from such investigation as I have given to it that the claim of McGarrahan is fraudulent and void. Now, having gone through all the Departments of the Government and through all the courts without success, McGarrahan finally comes before the Judiciary Committee and asks an investigation of what? Why, of the title of the Government to these lands. Now, nobody disputes the title of the Government in these lands, and the minerals taken out by this company are taken out under the general mining laws. That mineral, the committee should recollect, by the policy of this Government and of nearly all governments, belongs to the discoverer. There are limits to the amount one citizen may take, and other restrictions are regulated by law. But in no event is the mineral gotten out to belong to the United States. Under the law all such questions as those suggestions in this debate are questions interesting private parties but never the Government.

Gentlemen ask if the party now in possession of these lands has not more land than the Government allows to a single person. I am sure I do not know how that is. Such a thing I suppose happens every day in the mining regions, but it is one of those cases in which Government can have no interest, which the ordinary laws of the country are fitted to determine. Therefore when I find McGarrahan coming before the Committee on the Judiciary and asking that the Government shall institute suit to determine this matter of taking out mineral which in no event concerns the Government, I am sure there is something behind his request. And when I find that request followed up by a special appropriation and a direction for special counsel to prosecute the suit, I think that means a prosecution by McGarrahan, nominally in the name and under the cover of the Government, but really in the interest of McGarrahan, not to establish his title, but to enable him in ordinary parlance to black-mail somebody.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Does my colleague deny that this company holds four thousand acres when they are entitled to hold only fifteen hundred?

Mr. POTTER. I do not know anything about that. All I know is that the ordinary laws of the country can control that matter, and that in no event would the mineral belong to the Government. What I apprehend is that in this suit in the name of the Government the claim of McGarrahan is in some way or other to be revived, and thus there will be restored to a standing in court a claim which has been declared to be fraudulent and void and is now barred at law. So far as the Government is concerned it can have nothing to gain in instituting such a suit, and Congress ought not to be expending the public moneys to enable any body to prosecute in its name.

Mr. RANDALL. An attempt is made here to reflect upon Mr. McGarrahan.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Mr. McGarrahan is poor, and this company is rich; that is the difference.

Mr. RANDALL. I have all my congressional life stood by the Government. I have resisted the McGarrahan claim, and I believe at one time my vote turned the result against McGarrahan. McGarrahan's conduct in this particular is quite natural. He thought he possessed the ownership of this land, and he and the New Idria Company contested the right to it. He was a contestant against the Government and the New Idria Company, and they defeated him. He then had a personal interest in the matter; that was his motive then. To-day he comes here and tells us that if his title is not good then the title of the United States is good, and, influenced by motives of disappointment and revenge and hate, if you please, he comes in to do our work, that is, the work of the Government, and crush out the New Idria Company. For one I am going to help him to do it.

Mr. PAGE. Does not the gentleman know as a matter of fact that the New Idria Company maintained the title of the United States?

Mr. RANDALL. I know, and all the time when they asserted the title of the Government they asserted their own profit.

Mr. PAGE. Which they had a right to do under the laws of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the real question now before it. Here is a proposition that asks the United States to intermeddle between the suits of two private citizens. The attempt is made to show that the United States is interested in doing so, because the property is very valuable; and an intimation is given out that if this thing which is proposed in the amendment is done, a very large revenue would come to the United States out of it.

Now, what mines have the United States ever run anywhere in the country? Suppose that there was $100,000,000 in value of quicksilver, or silver, or gold being taken out of this mine. Did ever anybody hear that the United States were the recipients of any profits by mining? Not at all. We have no other interest in this question than simply to see a fair adjustment between private citizens. If McGarrahan has no right, if the New Idria Company has no right, then the first squatter that comes along has the right to take possession of this mining property and go on and use it.

They have been trying their rights in the courts, and the courts are all open to them. It is now proposed by an impertinent, intermeddling resolution, to be made into an act of Congress, that we shall take hold of the matter and throw the weight of the United States into a private quarrel in which we have not a dollar of interest one way or the other. It is to be done by a special act, overruling the Departments and intermeddling with the executive action of our Government, and all to help revive again into life the claim of a man who has been beaten in every tribunal he ever appeared in; a man who had a claim based upon a forgery. Even if the deed had been good, his claim was in fact located thirty miles away from the mine on which he attempted to superimpose it. It was a double fraud in which McGarrahan was detected, in which he has been exposed before the courts, exposed on the floor of this House, exposed in the Senate, and exposed everywhere. And now it is proposed to give him another trial by special act of Congress.

The question was taken upon the following amendment of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE to the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts:

Provided, That no suit shall be commenced by virtue of this provision or prosecuted except under the control and direction of the Department of Justice; and no special counsel shall be employed unless by his assent and direction.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, as modified, to insert the following:

To enable and authorize the Department of Justice to aid the Commissioner of the General Land Office to recover certain lands, and the rents and profits thereof, known as the "Rancho Panoche Grande," in California, as provided in the resolution passed by the House of Representatives on the 26th of January, 1875, $5,000, or so much as may be necessary therefor.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 75, noes 68.

Mr. PAGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 56.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. PAGE. I give notice that I shall call the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in California, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, fourteen dollars for township, and twelve dollars for section lines, and for heavily-timbered mountain lands at augmented rates, not exceeding eighteen dollars per linear mile for standard, sixteen dollars for township, and fourteen dollars for section lines, $70,000.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend the clause just read by making the appropriation $90,000 instead of $70,000. In the State of California there are eighty-seven million acres of unsurveyed public lands. These lands as soon as they are surveyed are taken up under the homestead and pre-emtion laws, and the money paid for them goes into the Treasury of the United States. Hence the appropriation for surveying these lands is merely a temporary advance on the part of the Government, because the sooner the lands are surveyed the sooner the Government gets its money for them.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I rise to oppose the amendment. I have examined this matter with some care. This appropriation, as well as the amount appropriated for surveying private land claims, is the same as was appropriated last year. The report of the General Land Office which I hold in my hand shows that there have been surveyed in California one million two hundred thousand acres, while there have been taken up under the homestead laws one hundred and sixty-nine thousand acres. All these different sections of the country—States and Territories—have been asking us for an increase of the appropriations for this purpose; and we would have been glad to gratify the parties making these applications; but we did not consider that such action was justified in the present condition of the Treasury. I trust the gentleman from California will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PAGE. If the Committee on Appropriations oppose the amendment, of course I withdraw it.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "70" and inserting "50," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $50,000. I make this motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and also of this House, to what I regard as a remarkable state of facts. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that during the last fiscal year there has been received from sales of the public lands $1,852,428.93; that there has been paid out for surveying public lands alone $874,190, and for expenses of collecting the revenue from sales of the public lands, $603,640; making in the aggregate for surveying the lands and for collecting the revenue from the sales of lands $1,477,830 in a single year, or within $400,000 of the total receipts from the sales of the public lands.

Now I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask members of this House, why it is, if we are studying economy, that we should fritter away nearly the whole revenue derived from the sales of the public lands in surveying those lands and collecting the revenue from the sales? I have in my desk a letter (on another subject, it is true) from the Commissioner of the Interior, a letter which has come into my possession as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, in which that officer says that it costs only three cents per mile for surveying the public lands. If that be true, why is this enormous expenditure necessary for these surveys and for collecting the revenue from the sales?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I have but a word to say in reply to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD.] The extent of the survey of public lands cannot be gauged wholly by the annual amount of sales. It is necessary to survey boundary lines, territorial, State, county and township lines, in order to make a section of country generally acceptable to the people who want to settle there. We must survey more widely than the actual settlements. The surveys must keep ahead of those settlements. Yet we have cut down these amounts for the Territories almost one-half.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I will tell the gentleman from West Virginia why the receipts from the sales of the public lands may not in all years equal the expenditures.

Mr. HEREFORD. I would be glad to know.

Mr. CONGER. It is because it is the judgment of this House that the poor people of the United States should have homesteads free. It is because we on this side of the House desire to give "land to the landless" and "homes to the homeless."

Mr. COX. We voted for it also.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, it has been the desire, so far as I know, on both sides of the House.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] tell us how successful we have been in that effort?

Mr. CONGER. We have been very successful in that effort. There are hundreds of thousands of people in the United States to-day who have homes and land given to them by their own country as freely as the law promised.

Mr. NIBLACK. When these people go west to hunt homes do they not find the best lands taken up by some land grant or by somebody else?

Mr. CONGER. They are not taken up by land-grabbers in my own State, but they are taken up there and elsewhere by actual settlers. There is but little purchased in Michigan or Wisconsin except pine lands by land speculators. It is settled upon by those who desire homes by the thousand and ten thousand who come from the Eastern States and Canada, and by hundreds of thousands who come from the Old World to fix their homes here. We must adopt one of two rules; either we must stop giving lands to the landless and homes to the homeless, or else we must stop the expense of the survey of these lands, providing that they shall not exceed the amount received.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am with the gentleman from Michigan on the main proposition, and my information is that these men who go out and hunt homes for themselves and families have to take up as homesteads the refuse lands, the best being taking up already by land speculators or land grants.

Mr. CONGER. When the speculator gets the land he pays money, and that is the money which goes into the Treasury, and when the settler gets the land he pays no money.

One thing in addition. Let me say as we have made these laws, and the gentleman from Indiana helped make them, no man can buy them for speculation. They are reserved now, henceforth, and forever as homes for the men and women who go there to settle upon them.

Mr. NIBLACK. Do not our agricultural college-land scrip take these lands? Does not the land scrip issued one way and another take up all these lands?

Mr. CONGER. Those things were done in former years, and of course that land scrip must be honored. The gentleman's friends did that years ago.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am informed that swamp-land scrip and land scrip of various kinds cover all these lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Utah Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $20,000.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty," so as to increase the appropriation from $20,000 to $30,000; and in order to give the reasons to the committee for making this amendment I send to the Clerk a letter from General Nathan Kimball, appointed surveyor-general of Utah from the State of Indiana, and ask that the extract I have marked be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SURVEYOR-GENERAL'S OFFICE, UTAH TERRITORY,
Salt Lake City, December 29, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I see that the Committee on Appropriations have subdivided the work and that the surveys in Territories are in the care of Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope that the appropriations will not be much less, if any, than I recommended in my report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Last year this Territory had only $20,000, while Wyoming and Montana had over $40,000. There are from five to eleven settlers in Utah seeking homes on public lands to one in either of the other Territories. Why we should be retarded by so small an amount is strange. Settlers are anxious to know where their lines are and how their lines may run, and with so small an appropriation it is impossible to accommodate the people asking for surveys, and they are not able to furnish money to do the work, while Congress appropriates thousands for the surveys of lands in other Territories that will not be settled for years to come. The people of our Territory are neglected. The Government would get an almost immediate return for all expenditures for surveys in this Territory as settlers are only waiting the survey that they may purchase the land. You know the constant and increasing immigration to our Territory, and the demand for homes upon public lands.

Very truly, your friend and obedient servant,

NATHAN KIMBALL,
Surveyor-General Utah Territory.

Hon. GEORGE Q. CANNON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. Since the establishment of the land office in Utah Territory, some six years ago, only $151,000 have been appropriated for the survey of public lands in that Territory, while in some of the other Territories during the last two years $130,000 have been appropriated for the same purpose. As will be seen from the letter of the surveyor-general, there is a demand for land in Utah, and there are a great many people who want their lines determined; and as a matter of economy it would be an advantage to increase this appropriation for surveying in that Territory. I do not wish to draw any contrast between Utah and the other Territories in this respect, but by an examination of the appropriations it will be found that Utah Territory has not had one-half as much appropriated for the survey of lands as some of the Territories. As the surveyor-general says, last year two Territories, into which there was comparatively little immigration, had doubled the amount appropriated. I know railroad lands have to be surveyed in all the Territories, as much in Utah, though, as in the others. I submit it would be to the advantage of the Government to make a larger appropriation for this Territory. I scarcely think that the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] who has had this matter in hand, or the Committee on Appropriations itself as a whole, can object to this amendment being made if the House is willing to accept it, for it is very clear that Utah has not had an equal proportion with the other Territories. I do not think any of them have had too much, and it is not with this view that I allude to the amounts they have received, but to show the discrimination there has been made against Utah.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to which this part of the bill was specially referred, I have personally no objection to this amendment. The fact is the Delegates, who are clever gentlemen, came to the committee and each one wished an increase of the appropriation for his particular Territory. The committee felt bound, I must say, looking at the figures, that Utah has had as much appropriation in proportion to the amount of lands surveyed as California, about which we have had a talk a while ago.

For instance, the whole amount surveyed in Utah, according to the figures I have before me from the General Land Office, is 545,593 acres. The amount settled as bounty lands was 23,857 acres; and under the homestead law 38,790 acres.

These amounts are only about one-fifth of the number of acres in California that have been settled under the homestead and other acts, and we give in this case more than one-fifth of what we give to California.

It is true the amount is not large. I think the amount we have hitherto appropriated to Utah is smaller than to some of the other Territories. Still the committee felt bound after the bill was made up to authorize me to say that they thought substantial justice would be done by this without any amendment.

The amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Utah, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying the public lands in Wyoming Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, and for heavily-timbered lands, at augmented rates not exceeding eighteen dollars per linear mile for standard, sixteen dollars for township, and fourteen dollars for section lines, $30,000.

Mr. STEELE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out $30,000 and insert $40,000.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to state to the committee that last year and this year the Land Office recommended an appropriation of $60,000 for each of these years for surveys of the Territory of Wyoming. Last year, under the stress of the difficulties of the occasion and the necessity for retrenchment, this appropriation with similar appropriations for the other Territories was reduced; so that the appropriation of $40,000 was made for that year. Now, the same recommendation was made this year of $60,000 that was made last year; but the Committee on Appropriations have cut it down to $30,000, reducing the amount $10,000 below the appropriation made last year; and this being the only Territory where they have reduced the appropriation below the amount appropriated last year. Every Territory has received as much as it received last year, with the exception of this Territory of Wyoming. Three of the Territories have received an increase of $10,000 each.

Now, to show that this amount of $30,000 will be insufficient to meet the requirements of that Territory, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, relating to the appropriation for the extension of the public surveys in Wyoming during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

You state that the honorable Committee on Appropriations has decided to reduce the amount from $60,000, as submitted by the Department, to one-half that amount, and ask whether in the opinion of this office an appropriation of $30,000 will be sufficient to properly carry on the necessary surveys in the Territory during the said fiscal year.

In reply I have to say that this office in making the estimate took into consideration the obligation of the Government to the railroad company, and the urgent demands of settlers for an early segregation of the lands, in order that they may be enabled to ascertain whether their locations are upon railroad or public lands, and named the sum of $60,000 as the lowest amount adequate to meet the requirements of the various parties interested.

In view of the requirements of actual settlers upon the public domain and the provisions of the third section of the act of July 1, 1862, (12 Statutes at Large, 492,) that "all such lands, so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption like other lands, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, to be paid to said company," the reduction contemplated by the committee, cannot, in my judgment, be made without serious detriment to the public interests and the interests of the railroad company.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. S. BURDETT,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. R. STEELE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let me just state the fact that Wyoming has had more than one million acres of land surveyed. The amount entered under the bounty act has been fourteen hundred acres; under the homestead act, seven hundred and twenty acres; agricultural colleges, four hundred and seventy-five acres; making less than three thousand acres disposed of in all ways, with more than one million acres surveyed. Now we give the same amount to Wyoming as the House has given to Utah, where the number of acres surveyed and occupied is much larger.

I dislike to oppose these small amendments, but it appears to me that $30,000 with that vast amount surveyed—more than a million acres surveyed, with not three thousand acres entered in all directions—is an ample appropriation. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. Let me say to the gentleman from Connecticut that there are settlements now in the Territory of Wyoming where there has been no survey and where the people are unable to acquire titles to their homes because there are no surveys; and the reason why this great difficulty exists is that through the entire length of the Territory from east to west there is a land grant of twenty miles on each side to the Union Pacific Railroad; so that a man in advance of survey cannot settle, as he can in Territories where there are no land grants, without running the risk of having his home taken from under him by the land-grant made before he settled.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The amounts occupied for bounty lands and homesteads altogether are smaller in Wyoming than in any of the other Territories. I think the gentleman is asking more than is asked for in other Territories when he proposes this increase.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being ayes 40, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying confirmed private land claims in New Mexico, at a rate not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile, $10,000: Provided, That the provisions of the third section of the act entitled "An act to reduce the expenses of the survey of the public lands in the United States," approved May 30, 1862, requiring that the cost of survey and platting shall be paid by the claimant for any private land claim before a patent therefor shall be issued, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. NESMITH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 847 insert the following:
And all contracts for the survey of the public lands provided for in this act shall be let to the lowest responsible bidders under such regulations as shall be provided by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that changes the law.

Mr. NESMITH. It is merely directory for the execution of the law as it stands, and is not a change of law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveying confirmed private land claims in New Mexico, at a rate not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile, $10,000: Provided, That the provisions of the third section of the act entitled "An act to reduce the expenses of the survey of the public lands in the United States," approved May 30, 1862, requiring that the cost of survey and platting shall be paid by the claimant for any private land claim before a patent therefor shall be issued, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to strike out the proviso to that paragraph for the purpose merely of asking a question. I would like the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain that proviso. I merely offer the amendment for the purpose of having an explanation of what would be the effect of that proviso.

Mr. GARFIELD. That was made in order by a suspension of the rules of the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It is the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that this is a valuable provision and it has his indorsement.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I believe that the only explanation is that it is inserted on the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I should like to make a further statement.

Mr. CLYMER. I should be glad to hear one.

Mr. GARFIELD. The statement made to the Committee on Appropriations by the Commissioner was that a man, for instance, has squatted upon a large claim. He is overlapping surrounding public lands; he does not want a survey and will not do anything to have a survey made, and parties who might want to locate lands in his immediate neighborhood are afraid to locate while the boundaries are undefined, and the result is that a large number of old Spanish grants lie there in a sort of floating condition and actual settlers are kept off. The law now says that when these private claims are surveyed the expense shall be paid by the party; but if the parties do not want them surveyed they do not take any steps to have them surveyed, and the Commissioner says that this blocks the settlement of the adjoining public lands. He states that the number of these claims is not large and he asks that the law may be changed so that be may go forward and order the surveys of these private land claims and fix the boundaries both of the private land claims and of the surrounding public lands.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question. In 1870 Congress passed a law compelling the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to pay for the survey of their own lands. Now, do I understand from the chairman of the committee that these provisions in this bill are intended to affect that law in any way whatever?

Mr. GARFIELD. O, not at all.

Mr. CLYMER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

OF PUBLIC LANDS.

For salaries and commissions of registers of land offices and receivers of public moneys at ninety land offices, $525,706.

Mr. RANDALL. I find an increase here of $36,000 and I would like the chairman of the committee to give me some information in regard to it. The increase in this paragraph amounts to $36,000, and in the next to $3,600, and in the next to $2,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. There were a very considerable number of new land offices created last year, which explains the whole difference. I went carefully over the whole appropriations of last year and the estimates for this, and the difference is strictly and wholly in consequence of the change in the law creating new land offices.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it is a large increase.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is large; but it is in consequence of the creation of new land districts.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement of the Capitol grounds, according to the plans and under the general direction of Fred. Law Olmsted, to be expended by the architect of the Capitol, $200,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment to come in at the close of the paragraph:

Of which sum $50,000 shall be made immediately available.

Mr. RANDALL. You do not propose to put anything in the deficiency bill for this purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; but the work ought to begin before July.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will see that last year we appropriated $200,000 for this purpose. Now, if you make this amount immediately available it practically makes the appropriation for this year $250,000 and leaves only $150,000 for next year.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; not practically. We did not pass the appropriation bill last year until the 21st of June and the money became available on the 1st of July. This is merely proposed as a matter of convenience. They can do the work if they get the appropriation earlier. There is no deficiency asked for; they only ask to be allowed to use a portion of this money before it would become available.

Mr. RANDALL. It is really a deficiency.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any moneys appropriated for the purpose of erecting a building on the ground owned by the Women's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, under the act of June 23, 1874, which may remain unexpended on the 30th of June, 1875, are hereby continued and rendered available for the service of the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. RANDALL. How much is that amount?

Mr. GARFIELD. We appropriated $25,000 for this purpose but none of the money was to be expended till a clear title had vested, and it had not vested until a few weeks ago. They cannot reasonably expend the money before the end of the present fiscal year.

The Clerk read the following:

Reform School of the District of Columbia:

For the superintendent, $1,500; two assistant superintendents, at $750 each; matron, $600; two teachers, at $600 each; for medicines and physician's fees, $500; gardener, $720; superintendent of workshops, $600; laborer, $144; seamstress, laundress, and servants, $540; and for fuel, clothing, and incidentals, $2,696; making in all the sum of $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire just here to have inserted in the record of our debates and proceedings—I do not want to take up the time of the committee by reading it—a statement showing that the appropriations by the Government for this District amount to $3,384,854.

Mr. GARFIELD. For how long a time?

Mr. RANDALL. For a year.

Mr. GARFIELD. For what year?

Mr. RANDALL. For this year.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do you mean to say that the appropriations to be expended during any one fiscal year amounts to that sum?

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I think it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. You add the appropriations of last session and the appropriations of this session.

Mr. RANDALL. No; I add together the appropriations made this session so far as I can trace them.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do you mean for the government of the District of Columbia?

Mr. RANDALL. I mean the appropriations expended by the Government in the District. For instance, I mean for the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, $8,000; United States Capitol, $250,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. You do not mean for the District?

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say for the District, but in the District. I mean the amount expended in the District of Columbia for every purpose, including the expenses of this District, for instance, $1,600,000. I want to show to the House and the country the benefit this District gets from having the Government here. I want to show that we expend here in this city annually about $3,384,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think very likely we expend very much more than that. We expend about thirty or forty millions to run the Treasury.

Mr. MERRIAM. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that there is being made a correct list of all the money expended in this District, outside of what is expended on Government property, each year for ten years past.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the list to which I refer of appropriations of money expended in the District of Columbia:

The Clerk read the following:

Metropolitan Police:

For salaries and other necessary expenses of the Metropolitan police for the District of Columbia, $205,270: Provided, That a further sum amounting to $102,635 shall be paid to defray the expenses of the said Metropolitan police force by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington, beyond the limits of said cities, in the District of Columbia, in the proportion corresponding to the number of privates allotted severally to said precincts; and the corporate authorities of said cities and proper authorities of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and required to levy a special tax, not exceeding one-third of 1 per cent., which shall be specially deposited once in each week, as such collections are made, to be appropriated and expended for said purposes only, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by inserting the word "concurrently" after the words "a further sum amounting to $102,635 shall;" so that whenever the Government pays a dollar the District shall pay a dollar for this purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that; that is a good amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Government Hospital for the Insane:

For the support, clothing, medical, and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service, and of persons who may have become insane from causes arising during their said service within three years after leaving the service in the Army or Navy of the United States, and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia, in the Government Hospital for the Insane, $150,171.

Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the paragraph just read so that it will read "for the support, clothing, medical, and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy, and the revenue-cutter service, and of all persons who may have become insane since their entry into the military and naval service of the United States," &c.

The committee rose informally.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4141) to make East Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi, a port of delivery in the district of Pearl River.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3379) for the further security of navigation on the Mississippi River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 976) to promote economy and efficiency in the marine-hospital service; and

A bill (S. No. 1379) to abolish the consulate at Amoor River and establish a consulate at Vladivostock, Russia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that on Saturday last the Senate adopted resolutions as an additional mark of respect to the late Senator BUCKINGHAM, of Connecticut.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The question was upon the amendment moved by Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask attention for a single moment in order that this amendment may be understood. The Government Hospital for the Insane of the District has been adopted by the Government.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask the gentleman to suspend, in order that the committee may now rise for the purpose of certain proceedings in reference to the memory of the late Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection to that, if it is understood we are to have an evening session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order, being House bill No. 4729, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that after the eulogies have been pronounced the House may take a recess until half past seven p. m., at which time this bill shall be in order as the business of the evening until finished.

Mr. RANDALL. No other business to be transacted? Let us understand that, so there may be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No understanding for me.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules so that after the eulogies have been pronounced the House will take a recess until half past seven, and that at that time we shall meet in Committee of the Whole on this and other appropriation bills. I will say "on this and other appropriation bills."

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the proposition be again stated by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that after the pronouncing of the eulogies on the late Senator from Connecticut, the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening; that it shall then meet in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the pending bill——

Mr. HALE, of Maine. And other appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it to be understood that no other business can be done?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not want to limit the business to action in Committee of the Whole. I desire that the Committee of the Whole shall have authority to rise and report the bills to the House.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to all these limitations. Let us come here to do business as we usually do. Let the House decide what shall be done.

Mr. CLYMER. We are going to decide it now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let it be decided when we come together this evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer this proposition in order to avoid a struggle for the floor.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio please state his proposition again?

Mr. GARFIELD. My proposition is, that after the obituary services this afternoon the House take a recess until seven and a half o'clock this evening; that we meet then in Committee of the Whole upon the pending appropriation bill; which bill and such other regular appropriation bills as may be brought in shall, until concluded, have precedence of all other business.

The SPEAKER. That does not mean that no other business shall be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say that nothing shall be done afterward, but I mean that these bills shall be the first business.

The SPEAKER. Will the House suspend the rules so as to give the pending appropriation bill and other regular appropriation bills precedence over all other business for to-night's session?

Mr. NEGLEY. No, we will not do that. We will agree to have a session for the consideration of these appropriation bills and such other business as a majority of the House may choose to take up.

Mr. RANDALL. Then, gentlemen, I give you notice that you must be here.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that when the House meets after the recess, it will consider the sundry civil appropriation bill and other appropriation bills before other business comes in.

Mr. NEGLEY. No, Mr. Speaker; that is not the understanding.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition, whether the House agrees to it or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then we will vote it down.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and agree to the proposition, there were—ayes 136, noes 19.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR BUCKINGHAM.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I rise to call up the resolutions just received from the Senate in regard to the death of the late Senator BUCKINGHAM.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 27, 1875.

Resolved by the Senate, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut, business be now suspended, that the friends and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Speaker, death calls us again to pause amid these busy scenes and pressing labors. How frequent the reminder. Half a score of those who were numbered with us at the commencement of the Forty-third Congress are to-day numbered with the dead. One by one loved and trusted associates have fallen among us, and we have borne them mournfully away to their resting place.

When, a few days since, the intelligence of the death of Senator BUCKINGHAM reached this Capitol, there was a deep sense of sadness and bereavement. To us who knew him intimately, who had met him in the sunlight of his home, who had felt the glow of his pure and generous heart, and had seen its ready response to every call of distress; to us who had long known him as the best beloved of all the honored names of our Commonwealth, there is a sadness inexpressible.

I am oppressed with a sense of my inability to sketch even the outline of a life so full of noble purpose and grand achievement. The community in which I live was bound to Senator BUCKINGHAM by the most endearing ties. He was born within the limits of the district I represent. Here he grew to manhood, here he passed all the years of his active business life, here his home, and here among his old neighbors and friends, beside the wife of his early love, in affectionate remembrance, he finds his resting place. Within the borders of the Commonwealth which he served and honored more fully than any public man of this generation he had won the affectionate veneration of the people.

WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM was born at Lebanon on the 28th of May, 1804, the son of an intelligent and thrifty farmer and influential citizen. He came from good stock. His ancestor, Thomas Buckingham, was one of the original settlers of New Haven, and the Rev. Thomas Buckingham, son of the latter, settled in Saybrook, and was one of the founders of Yale College and of the synod that formed the Saybrook platform. Counting back seven generations from the farmer's son of Lebanon, the "noble war governor," we reach the founder of our university.

He was born and reared amid patriotic associates, for since the days of Jonathan Trumbull, and even in the colonial period, Lebanon was pre-eminent for its patriotism. But he did not rest his claim for success on illustrious ancestry or fortunate associations, but went forth to gain success by his own exertions. All his life has been filled with usefulness and crowned with honor. No better example can be afforded for our study and imitation.

His public life consisted mainly of eight years' service as governor of Connecticut, commencing in 1858 and ending in 1866, and a service of nearly six years in the Senate. Prior to his election as governor in 1858, he had often been solicited to accept offices of honor and responsibility. These he had uniformly declined, with the exception of four years as mayor of Norwich.

As governor he showed marked executive ability. When the news came of the firing on Sumter, and President Lincoln made his first call for troops, he did not wait for an extra session of the Legislature to provide means. The public confidence in him was so complete that he secured at once ample means, and the troops were immediately sent forward for the defense of the nation fully armed and equipped. for service. His labors were unceasing, and his patriotism inspired the people everywhere. During all the war, as the chief executive of the State, he devoted himself to the public service with a zeal and self-sacrifice that has rarely been equaled, and he earned well the title of "noble war governor." Year after year he was re-elected; and at the close of the war, when last chosen, his majority was unprecedented in our State. He looked well to the comfort of the soldiers, and thought little of his own. He gave his whole time to the work, and contributed largely of his private fortune. In this outline it is impossible to represent the measure of his service or his patriotism that won the affection of the people and made his name a household word in every home in the Commonwealth.

He had most fully the confidence of President Lincoln, and was frequently called by him to advise as to most important matters connected with his administration.

He comprehended from the first more fully than most of our statesmen the nature of the rebellion and the strength and resources of the confederacy. In his letter to President Lincoln, dated June 25, 1861, he said:

In your message I trust you will ask for authority to organize a force of four or five hundred thousand men, for the purpose of quelling the rebellion, and for an appropriation from the public Treasury sufficient for their support. Let legislation upon every other subject be regarded as out of time and place, and the one great object of suppressing the rebellion be pursued by the Administration with vigor and firmness, without taking counsel of our fears, and without listening to any proposition or suggestion which may emanate from rebels or their representatives, until the authority of the Government shall be respected, its laws enforced, and its supremacy acknowledged in every section of the country. To secure such high public interests, the State of Connecticut will bind her destinies more closely to those of the General Government, and in adopting the measures suggested she will unreservedly pledge all her pecuniary and physical resources and all her moral power.

In the most disastrous days, when many lost hope, his faith in the success of the Union cause knew no abatement. His zeal and patriotism inspired everywhere in our Commonwealth measureless activity. On every call for troops the State was ready to furnish more than its quota, and they went out thoroughly equipped and with the best arms.

Of his service in the Senate there is no need that I should recall it here. Although he had received no previous legislative training, he entered at once with great aptitude and readiness on his duties. He made no claim to oratory, but he had what is better, a fund of useful information, a practical knowledge of business, and a ready ability to express clearly and forcibly his views. He was systematic, industrious, and faithful in a remarkable degree.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Commerce he mastered most fully the important questions that were there presented for discussion and action. As chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs he stood resolutely for justice for this stricken race, who so sadly need friends. His voice and his vote were always given with the most conscientious regard for the public interest and the nation's honor.

In the Senate he won the respect of his associates, and, judged by the work accomplished, the results, the services of Senator BUCKINGHAM were eminently successful.

In private life no language can present him in his true nobility of character. As a citizen, enterprising, public spirited, he had a liberal hand for every good work. His benevolence knew no limit. H gave liberally to endow schools and colleges and to aid charitable institutions, but his contributions which flowed out in a thousand directions and which have found no record here will in the aggregate exceed those many fold.

The cause of education found in him an earnest, intelligent advocate. His consistent example for temperance, always inflexibly maintained, was more persuasive than the pulpit or the platform.

His religious convictions were of the highest type, and the precepts of inspiration were with him the rule of action in his daily life. His faith in the Infinite, his love of truth, gave him a grand courage in the battle of life. His foundations were sure. He never hesitated or faltered. He met all the great responsibilities and trials of life, and triumphed, being upheld—

Through the dear might of Him that walked the waves.

And while to-day we are clothed in sadness, we acknowledge with gratitude the goodness and wisdom of our heavenly Father who has given such a life to the world, for his example is immortal. Not alone statesmen and those in high places in the council of the nation will profit by it, but all who shall come within its beneficent influence. He died at his home. Tender and sympathizing friends were with him to minister consolation. He passed peacefully to his earthly repose and to the rewards of life immortal—

There entertain him all the saints above
In solemn troop and sweet societies,
That sing and in their glory move
And wipe the tears forever from all eyes.

Great and generous spirit, farewell!

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, death, which comes but once yet comes to all, has made fearful havoc in our ranks during the few short weeks of this session, and has taught us again and again, if we heed the lesson, what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue. Four of our own number, since we came together, less than three months since, have been summoned from our side and have seen the last of earth. And three of the members-elect of the next Congress, having just passed through the struggle, the excitement, and the triumph of the contest for a place in this Hall, have fallen by the wayside, weary with the march of life. And should not this teach us, my brothers, how empty and fleeting are the honors and earthly prizes for which we strive, and how soon they must elude our grasp? Should it not teach us also that the few years that are given us here should be devoted to the work that shall lead us to a higher and a better life; to works of love and charity and good will for each other, and kindly aid and help to all who need and can receive it at our hands? Life is too short, there is too little of it, to have its days or even its hours wasted and worse than wasted in cherishing enmities or wounding the heart or the reputation of another who must soon lie side by side with us in the grave, "that covers every defect, buries every error, and extinguishes every resentment."

And now the blow has fallen upon a member of the other House, whom none could know well without cherishing for him an earnest love and admiration when living, and a keen regret and an abiding sorrow for his loss when dead. The State of Connecticut to-day mourns the departure of her faithful public servant, her honored war governor, her Christian patriot and statesman. No name of all her sons in this generation has been more familiar, or spoken with higher reverence or warmer affection than his. No name in the long line of her honored chief magistrates has commanded a respect and admiration and love beyond his. In the mansions of the rich and by the firesides of the lowly, in all her towns and villages, and among all her hills and hamlets for years past the name of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM has been a household word.

There is a beautiful agricultural town in Eastern Connecticut called Lebanon, named, as is said, by one of the early Puritan clergymen, in the scriptural fashion of that day, from a grove of goodly cedars found within its borders. As Connecticut has sometimes been called the mother of States, so that town has well been called the mother of her governors. There the Trumbulls, father and son, and another of the name were born, all of them filling the executive chair of the State in their day and generation. Of the twenty-five governors of our State who held the office from 1769 to 1865, almost a century, three governors, natives of that little town, held the office thirty-three years. They were Jonathan Trumbull, the elder and younger, and the late Governor BUCKINGHAM. No other man since the days of the Trumbulls has held the office so long at the hands of a grateful people as Governor BUCKINGHAM, with one exception, that of Oliver Wolcott. The elder Trumbull held the office for the longest period of all; he who will always be known as the war governor in our struggle for independence as a nation, the fast friend and the chosen confidant of Washington, whose affectionate and loving, though homely title, by which he addressed him as Brother Jonathan, has symbolized this country for a century, and will last while the Republic shall endure.

There WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM was born in 1804. In his early youth he was surrounded by a generation that had known well the war governor of the Revolution; and the stories told in childhood and the historical studies and all the high aspirations of his youth, together with that true New England pride in the name of an eminent man of one's native town, all conspired to make young BUCKINGHAM revere and seek to emulate the character of the illustrious Trumbull. How well and how grandly and completely his life fulfilled the aspirations of his youth this generation well knows. Like Trumbull, he became a merchant; and they, like that honored associate of ours from Massachusetts, Mr. Hooper, whose remains were borne from this Hall a few days ago, were of that class whose merchants are princes and whose traffickers are the honorable of the earth. Like Trumbull, he acquired wealth; and like Trumbull also in his later life he learned the hard lesson, harder and more difficult to bear as crowding years have gathered over one, that losses will come and that riches often take to themselves wings and fly away. Like Trumbull, he lavished his wealth and gave freely with full hands for all objects that were good and noble, for the culture, the education, and the moral and religious improvement of his fellow-men. And like Trumbull, though he might have died with more of this world's goods that he could not take away if he had been less liberal and charitable and benevolent, he has taken with him into the skies the abounding riches of a life of virtue, of charity, of love and good-will toward men; and he has left behind a richer and more priceless legacy to his people than all the wealth of Ormus, or all the shining piles of silver and gold that mortal man has ever accumulated—an honorable and a stainless name.

The flying hours of a closing session admonish me that I cannot linger as long as I would in this last tribute to our honored and beloved Senator. He will be best known in the history of his country as the war governor of Connecticut in the late great conflict for a nation's unity and a nation's life; and here I might pursue the parallel with Trumbull if time would allow me. He gave his whole time and strength to the work. In the darkest hour of his country's trial he was ever cheerful, confident, hopeful, energetic. With a courage that never faltered, and with a faith fast fixed on the future glories of a country saved, reunited, and redeemed from the national shame and sin that had caused the war, he went through with his exhausting work to the end. I might fill pages with incidents of his devotion, his patriotism, and his untiring energy during those four sad, weary years, even of those that came under my own observation. And on the very day in April, 1865, that the cannon were booming and bells were ringing out the glad tidings that the power of the rebellion was broken and the city of its government had surrendered to the Union armies, he was re-elected governor for the eighth and last time by the largest majority ever given to a candidate during my residence in the State, now more than thirty years. He refused to be again a candidate. Severe labors and gathering years demanded rest and quiet. But his people were unwilling to leave him there. He was elected to the Senate, and took his seat in the spring of 1869. Those of us who have been here during this last six years can bear witness how faithfully he has done his work there. In his place in the Senate he has honored his State more than his State could honor him. Nor has his work been confined to the Senate and the committee-room. Those hours that at his age should be given to rest he has devoted to the constant and numberless calls that one faithful to his constituents will here find daily on his hands. As Burke said to his constituents, his work was at the Departments also; he went about constantly wherever the affairs or the interests of his people could call him. For the humblest as well as the highest of his people he was ever ready to give his own personal labor and effort. His fellow-Senators have spoken his praise in words of no unmeaning eulogy. Courteous, kindly, and a perfect gentleman in his intercourse with all, they learned to love him all; no harsh expression or word of insult or unkindness to a brother member, in the heat of debate or otherwise, fell from his lips, and the Senate Chamber is fragrant with loving and tender memories of their departed associate.

I met Senator BUCKINGHAM for the last time in August. We had been a day or two together, and he was then in ill-health and seeking rest and recreation. I remember the saddened and worn expression upon his face, though lighted up as always with his beaming, kindly smile, as he took my hand at parting in our room at the sea-side hotel, and said, "I shall be stronger when the warm weather is over, and we will meet again at Washington, ready for hard work in December." But he never came. His work was done. He had lived with a life full of every good word and work, to the allotted years of threescore and ten; and if the prayers and wishes of his people could have availed, as they cannot, his years should have been more than four score, and none of his days should have been those of weakness or sorrow. He died before his term of office expired; and it is worthy of note that the last Senator from Connecticut, who had died before him, during his term of office was a fellow-townsman of our deceased friend—Mr. Jabez W. Huntington, who died at his residence in Norwich nearly thirty years ago.

Patriotism, piety, benevolence, charity, and a strict integrity were the characteristics of the life of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM. His patriotism was intense. Those of us who saw him often during the war can never forget it. If there was one thing that he could not forgive in the day and time of it, it was disloyalty to the country, though his heart was full of forgiveness after the war was over. His piety was unquestioned; it was in his daily walk and daily life. He can well bear the name of a Christian statesman; for though in these days when the clouds of calumny are thick about the heads of all men in public life, it is the fashion of some men to speak sneeringly of Christian statesmen, yet the bitterest scoffer and traducer can well mention the name of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM as a Christian statesman without a sneer. His benevolence was large as his heart; his bounty was ample as his means. Much he gave to public, religious, educational, and charitable institutions; but there were silent streams of charity flowing into many an afflicted or impoverished household that the world knew not of. How much those people mourn his loss none but God and they can know; but the prayers and the blessings of the poor he befriended in life are among the brightest jewels of his crown of rejoicing. His integrity no man could question. A bright example of the constant exercise of all the virtues of a well-spent life he has given for us in the few years that are left us, and a noble character for our sons to study and emulate as they grow up to manhood. In contemplating the close of such a life, the prayer must and will spring to our lips, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." A life like his must surely lead, as God is just and good, to the thanatopsis so beautifully described in the familiar language of one of New England's native poets.

> "So live that when thy summons comes to join
> The innumerable caravan which moves
> To that mysterious realm where each shall take
> His chamber in the silent halls of death,
> Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
> Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
> By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The sad intelligence just brought to us invites me to look back a quarter of a century, when the life of WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM, then in its meridian as a business man, philanthropist, and Christian, was referred to with pride by his fellow-men and pre-eminently worthy the example of the school-boy.

It is fitting and graceful that those who have enjoyed his acquaintance without interruption and represent the same State here that he did in the Senate should tell us of his more striking characteristics and delineate the features of that well-rounded life of which all who knew him are so justly proud; what foot-prints he has left upon the sands of Connecticut, what impression upon her institutions.

I want to say a word about him in the connection in which so many great and good men of New England might be spoken of—as a friend and benefactor of something new, or young, or feeble in the West.

The connection of some eastern men with the growth of the West has not been written, and owing to the sacredness of its nature much of it perhaps never will be.

What the West owes to the East for her habits, her ideas of education, her humane laws, and her religious example will come within the scope and province of future historians, who will note the acquisitions to the prairies of ennobling characteristics, advanced ideas, and institutions of reform and charity. It will be easy to trace to their true source in the East the school laws that tax all the property to educate all the children, the town library, the town meeting, laws abolishing imprisonment for debt, and exempting from execution. But the Eastern men who followed with their sympathies the pioneers who first reclaimed from nature the fields that now teem with plenty, from the modesty that accompanies such goodness of heart are not likely to be recorded in history with due credit, and that, too, because the right hand did not know what the left hand was doing. This liberality was particularly extended toward the endowment of our struggling colleges and academies, and follows the pioneer to his new home in the West as regularly as the manners and habits of his eastern home. Just how much of the rapid growth of our advanced institutions of learning is due to such benefactions may never be known, but their influence in molding the character of western men and bringing into harmony with the spirit of enlightenment that is placing our country in the front of progressive nations will live and be potent for good long after the donors have gone to their reward.

WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM was of this race of nobility a typical man.

A colony from Norwich, Connecticut, settled in central Iowa over twenty years ago. It is common in the West in many localities to call divisions of land, rivers, creeks, villages, and towns, to perpetuate what was familiar, famous, or excellent in the East after the apt aboriginal names had been exhausted. This colony named a congressional township and village Buckingham. One of the first things done by such colonies is to build a school-house where the children may learn, where religious worship may be held on the Sabbath, where the temperance lectures may be delivered, where the lyceum may meet, where the agricultural society may discuss, where elections can be held, where the different elements that comprise a western community first learn to fraternize, where the women weave the fabrics of sympathy and friendship that clothe society with its comeliest garments and acquaintance is first made by the young people that is to ripen into esteem, friendship, and affection.

Governor BUCKINGHAM contributed liberally to the first school-house built in the new settlement.

A mutual friend repeated to me his observation when speaking of the fact that his name was to be associated with a locality in Iowa. Said he, "I understand a beautiful town has been named for me in Iowa, and I have had the honor of aiding in building a school-house in it, and am as ready to aid in building a church for education, and Christianity will be the basis of prosperity in Iowa, as in New England." He built from basement to spire a church that is only rivaled in beauty of design by the landscape it graces. Just how much the generous spirit of this one man has done for the place and people I speak of cannot be estimated by any measure of value with which we are familiar. The few scattering cabins that first dotted the prairie about Buckingham have long since been replaced by white cottages with green window-blinds. The few pioneers that first worshiped in the old school-house built by Mr. BUCKINGHAM have swelled to a thickly-settled neighborhood with many school-houses. They tell as plainly of the rising of the people as the beacon-fires on the hill-tops told of the gathering of the highland clans, but the numerous churches indicate that the rising promises peace instead of war.

So little is generally known of the extent of the benefactions to our young institutions of learning that although my district has three colleges to whose endowment eastern men of wealth have contributed liberally, and are still contributing, I only know the names of a few of them. I would be glad to incorporate in my remarks the names of each of the noble men whose generosity has gone over the Alleghanies to help build up our schools, churches, and colleges. The names of W. A. BUCKINGHAM, Oakes Ames, William E. Dodge, Samuel Wilston, and Ezra Cornell readily occur to me as prominent examples.

President Thacher, of our State University, told me an anecdote that illustrates Governor BUCKINGHAM'S whole life. A friend called upon him and found him in deep mental distress. Upon inquiring the cause Mr. BUCKINGHAM replied that after a careful inquiry into his private business he discovered that he had made too much money.

There is a Christian influence at work in America that is not confined to States, and a bond of union that is stronger than the Constitution. Its promoters are above partisan or sectional feeling, and its objects are grander than the development of our material resources, which only indicates its advancing steps. It has a history, and a record is well preserved of all its advocates.

This cause has lost one of its strong men, and that the breach may be healed we are impelled to say with the sweet singer of Israel:

> Help, Lord, because the godly man
> Doth daily fade away,
> And from among the sons of men
> The faithful do decay.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, one could hardly form the acquaintance of the late Senator BUCKINGHAM without respecting and liking him. To know him at all was to feel sure that he was an upright, just, and honorable man. There was a modest dignity in his demeanor, there was a gentleness and cordiality in his manner, which at once inspired confidence and commanded respect. I never met him in the way of public duty without being impressed by a sense of his sound judgment and high principle. I never met him in private life without a deeper regard for his pure, gentle, and kindly nature.

But with all his moderation and kindness no one could ever doubt that Senator BUCKINGHAM held to his opinions upon full conviction. He carried his notions of "loyalty," of "abolition," or of "abstinence" into his daily life, and insisted upon them modestly, but with a firmness and consistency such as is shown only by men who believe.

There is a striking and a hopeful lesson, sir, in such a life as was that of the late Senator. Trained in those common schools of the country which are open to every child; beginning business in a small way; gaining success by upright, faithful, and prompt attention to that business; gradually acquiring influence and fortune, and with them acquiring sound and honorable reputation, he came in time—though perhaps not a man of brilliant natural abilities—to fill with complete success positions of the highest usefulness and dignity. Chosen governor of his Commonwealth before the late civil war, he continued to discharge the duties of that position during all that trying time with an ability, patriotism, efficiency, and determination which induced his people to repeatedly re-elect him to that office against the usual custom of the State. Removed then to his position in the Senate, his service there was marked by such a careful, judicious, and efficient discharge of his senatorial duties; by such a wise and conscientious regard for the best interests of the people; by such personal gentleness, purity, and kindness, as commanded from all who served with him there, or knew him at all, their warmest praise, and call now for their deepest regret at his loss.

My political views differed widely from those of Senator BUCKINGHAM. But I knew that he held his opinions from conviction and that according to his light he served the nation purely, honestly, and faithfully, with judgment, with efficiency, and with the greatest kindness toward all. Whoever, sir, does that, with whatever talents may be intrusted to him, has done his best, and when called away from his labors here has deserved of all men that high respect and warm regard which those who knew him felt for the late Senator from Connecticut.

For myself, I share in the regret expressed in both Houses of Congress at his loss, and am glad to be allowed to add these few words to the eulogiums that have just been so warmly and so fitly passed upon this worthy, kindly, and honorable Christian gentleman.

[Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. By the order of the House, the House now takes a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The House accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House assembled at half past seven o'clock in Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the pending amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. MCDILL.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 938 insert "all" between the words "of" and "persons," and strike out lines 939 and 940 and insert "since their entry into the military and naval service;" so it will read:

And of all persons who may have become insane since their entry into the military and naval service of the United States, &c.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to raise the point of order on this—not on the amendment, but on the paragraph—that it changes existing law. If you turn to the statute-book you will find that the existing law is that all soldiers and sailors who become insane at any time——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Massachusetts that the point of order is quite too late. The paragraph has been read and an amendment thereto has been offered and discussed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All right. It may be voted down, I guess.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I had the floor when the committee suspended its session in the afternoon, and was about to say this: The clause in reference to the Government Hospital for the Insane is now arranged in accordance with actual law. The Committee on Appropriations investigated into it and had an opinion of the Attorney-General as to a clause that crept into an old appropriation bill.

Now let me state, that the committee may understand it clearly, because I presume very few have investigated it, just what the point is. The committee will notice that as it now reads we are appropriting—

For the support, clothing, medical and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service—

That is, all those who are now in the service. No one perhaps would object to that. It is perhaps going pretty far, but I would not object to it—and of persons who may have become insane from causes arising during their said service within three years after leaving the service in the Army or Navy of the United States and who are indigent.

Now, under this the Government is actually appropriating for the care of every person in all the vast armies of the Union, numbering millions, who become insane within three years from the time of leaving that service from causes arising during the service. Gentlemen will see that even this is a very large class, and this provision will entail upon us the support of a large number.

But the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin goes further, and he substitutes words that will make the Government responsible for the care and maintenance at the Washington Insane Asylum of every person who was ever a soldier in the armies of the United States and becomes insane after the date of his service. Gentlemen will see that this insane hospital, spacious as it is, with its buildings and wing, its dormitories, all of the paraphernalia of a great asylum, and which now numbers six or seven hundred patients, at an annual expense of not less than $200,000, must be increased from year to year if it is to embrace all those who have ever been in the Union armies.

Now, it is not a question—and I beg gentlemen not to be diverted from the real issue—of sympathy with the soldier. With all that the States are doing, with the asylums that are established in almost every State, with what is done by private enterprise, with the care that is bestowed upon the soldier by the States, are gentlemen prepared here and now to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which means, what? I have said that if every man who ever became insane, who was ever in the United States service, shall be taken from the State of Massachusetts, from the State of Maine, from the State of Wisconsin, from the State of California, and brought here by the Government of the United States, I believe it is going too far.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. MAYNARD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. COOPER as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3813) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. DAVIS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3511) regulating the removal of causes from State courts to the circuit courts of the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CARPENTER, Mr. CONKLING, and Mr. THURMAN as conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole then resumed its session, Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, before the year 1866 the Insane Hospital of the Government in the District of Columbia was appropriated wholly to the insane of the District of Columbia and of the Army and Navy and those who had become insane three years after leaving the service. It was then obvious that this would shut out every volunteer soldier, and this provision did not creep into the appropriation bill, but was discussed on this floor as this one is now being discussed, and it was put into an appropriation bill so as to extend the benefits of this Government Insane Hospital to the insane soldiers of the Union Army for all time.

And I must be allowed here to express my surprise that the Committee on Appropriations, for whom I have so much respect as I have, should undertake in this bill to cut out every Union soldier from the benefits of this hospital, while every man, woman, and child in the District of Columbia, or who may come here, has the benefit of this asylum, if they be indigent insane of the District of Columbia—not that they must be residents here, but that if here. Now every one of our soldiers who comes to this hospital must be indigent, or if they have friends to take care of them they would not be sent there. What are you going to do with all the insane men who were in the Army? Are you going to allow them to wander in the streets, to leave them to the cold charity of the world? Are we to keep up this immense charity for the people of the District of Columbia alone? My amendment is in the words in every appropriation bill for the last nine years. For the support, clothing, medical, and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service, and of all persons who may have become insane since their entry into the military or naval service of the United States and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia, in the Government Hospital for the Insane, $150,171.

So that we only restore this bill exactly to what the law is. The reason why I speak of it is this: We have either got to support these men here in the insane asylum or to support them in the homes for disabled soldiers, and many of them cannot get into the national homes under our laws because they cannot prove that their disability arose from wounds received in the service, because of their very insanity. Now, I for one am willing to vote the last dollar of the Government and to pay my share of the tax to support disabled soldiers or sailors of the Army or Navy of the United States who are now insane. Who shall say what it was that shattered the mind of such a man? Who shall trace the connection, who shall say that the disability only broke out in three years?

Now, I cannot argue this question, for the statement of it is so strong; but I call the attention of my friends on the other side of the House to this question hereafter. When you have the power I conjure you never allow the insance soldiers to wander about the streets and not have the benefit of the Government Asylum for the Insane, when every man, woman, and child here in this District who is indigent can have that benefit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. One word. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is always more pathetic than I can be in reference to the soldier, but he is no more his friend than I am. I want to say that the gentleman is entirely wrong as to this thing creeping into the appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I say it was discussed on the appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The matter was brought before the Attorney-General. I believe the gentleman himself had something to do with bringing it before the Attorney-General.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hold the opinion of the Attorney-General in my hand. He says:

> The act of 1866 provides that the following classes of persons, under the following circumstances, shall be entitled to admission into the said asylum on the order of the Secretary of War, if in the Army, or the Secretary of the Navy, if in the Navy, to wit:
>
> First. Men who, while in the service of the United States, in the Army and Navy, have been admitted to the asylum—
>
> Nobody objects to that—
> and have been thereafter discharged therefrom on the supposition that they have recovered their reason, and have within three years after their discharge become insane from causes existing at the time of their discharge, and have no adequate means of support—
>
> Nobody objects to that.
>
> Second. Indigent insane persons who have been in the service and have been discharged therefrom on account of disability arising from such insanity—
>
> Nobody objects to that.
>
> Third. Indigent insane persons who have become insane within three years after discharge from such service from causes which arose during and were produced by said service—
>
> Nobody objects to that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Within three years.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Yes; that is as the committee put it in the bill. Then the Attorney-General goes on, after discussing how it came into the appropriation act of 1869, and says:

> There was then in 1869 no provision for those who had been volunteers and who might subsequently become insane. In the appropriation bill of that year, after the usual words extending the benefits of the asylum to the insane of the Army, Navy, and revenue-cutter service, these words were inserted; "and volunteer service who may have become insane since their entry into the service of the United States."

Now, that is not the law; it is only what was put in that year; it was in the appropriation for that year. It was to an extent a definition for that year, but it has not been followed since, and is not followed now, because the committee have gone back and by the light of the Attorney-General's decision have taken the old law.

I do not want this committee to be diverted from the real issue by the fact that the gentleman makes a pathetic appeal that we must stand by the soldiers of the Army. Wherever it is proper, wherever anything can be done for the soldiers of the Army that needs to be done, we are doing it every day. The gentleman is no more foremost than the rest of us in that regard; he cannot arrogate to himself the guardianship of the million of men who stood in the forefront of battle and maintained the cause of the United States in the war of the rebellion. There are others here who believe in them as much as he does; and there are others here who believe that while that is good policy there are other laws that we should obey, and that this thing may be carried so far that the Government will become involved in an expenditure that it never would become involved in if it had fair notice of what was intended.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLYMER. I move to strike out the last word.

No one will unite more cheerfully than myself with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in recognizing the obligation of the Government to care for those who have become insane by reason of causes arising during the time they were serving the Government and within any reasonable time subsequent to that service. This is a duty resting alike upon all.

But it does seem to me that three years after quitting that service should be a sufficient time to determine whether the insanity arises from causes incident to the service. I am deeply interested in this subject of the care of the insane. My duties in my own State for years have led me to consider the subject. I would be loth to do anything here which was not consistent with their best and highest interests. But it does seem to me that the Government is not liable for so large a class who might claim their support under the provision as it would be made by this amendment.

I do not think there is a State in the Union where ample provision is not made by State law and through State care for the class spoken of in the paragraph under consideration. It appears to me that if we limit the time to three years subsequent to the service we have done all that generosity and our better instincts would lead us to do in reference to those who served the Republic. And if insanity occurs subsequently to that time we might with safety leave it to the several States to deal with them as they do with their other citizens. For if they remain well three years after quitting the service, and subsequently this calamity, the worst which may befall humanity, comes upon them, then the States, the proper guardian of the individual, having provided asylums for this purpose, may be safely trusted, I think, to take care of these men.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single word in opposition to the amendment. The attention of the committee was never called to the peculiar expression here until the letter of the Attorney-General was sent to us this year. There was also for the first time an appropriation asked for transporting insane soldiers of the late war for the Union.

A MEMBER. Not the first time.

Mr. GARFIELD. For the first time within my knowledge since I have been chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a special appropriation was asked this year for the transportation of insane soldiers. There may have been such an appropriation before, but it did not come under my notice.

Now, if this is to cover all who were ever in the volunteer army, then the result is this: One man becomes insane in California, another in Oregon, another in Maine; and all these have to be transported at the expense of the United States all the way to Washington to be put into this asylum, while Maine, California, Oregon, every State in the Union, has its hospital for the insane, where such men, being citizens of the State, are entitled to admission under the same rules and regulations as every other citizen.

Now, it is not good economy to transport men one thousand, two thousand, three thousand or more miles to place them in a central asylum, when perhaps in coming to Washington they pass by a dozen asylums. We therefore say only this: That a man whose insanity was the result of the war, who has become insane because of the war, (and three years ought to be a fair time to test that,) shall be under the special care of the Government.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Does the gentleman know a single State in the North that does not make provision for its own insane?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir. If a man should become insane in my own town, I certainly should think it very bad economy to send him off to Washington.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. And would it not cost twice as much in that way?

Mr. GARFIELD. Three times as much. We have two asylums in Ohio—one in the northern part of the State, another in the southern; and a third is building. With all these munificent arrangements for the care of the insane, it seems to me an unwise and uneconomical provision to shift them off in this way to a distant central institution.

I admit that one thing has been left out of the account. All who are now in our Army or Navy or who may hereafter be in our Army or Navy in any war that may arise, and who may become insane, will be entitled to come here to this asylum, because in the service of the Government. In this provision we simply restore the law to what it was on the organization of this institution, so that it shall be for persons under the immediate supervision of the Government of the United States, and shall not undertake to run as a rival establishment to those of the various States. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations robs no man of his right to be placed in an asylum, and cannot by any possible strain of construction be said to be against the soldiers of our late war.

The question being taken on Mr. CLYMER'S amendment to the amendment, to strike out the last word, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. As gentlemen who were not here when this question was brought up have since come in. I wish to make one last appeal to the House. For seven years this provision has been made in favor of soldiers of the Union Army who may become insane. They cannot get into the national asylum, for they cannot make the necessary proofs; they cannot take the required oath. All that the board of managers of the national asylum have been able to do has been to send them here under the law. For five years there has been an annual appropriation to send them here; but last year that failed, the matter escaping everybody's notice.

The object of the people in this District is to make this asylum a pet plaything, a close corporation for their own use or that of a few of their friends.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. O, no.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Do not interrupt me; you would not let me interrupt you. Now, the law stands on the statute-book precisely as it has done for six years. And who got the Attorney-General to send a written opinion to the Committee on Appropriations, and which the chairman of the committee said was the first time he heard that it was not the law? How came somebody to be so anxious to cut off the Union soldiers (for this cuts off every one of them, and there are some one hundred of them there) and send them out into the world to be transported God knows where?

Now I am told that I am arrogating something in my appeal in behalf of the Union soldier. I only say I do stand here to plead for the insane soldiers—men made insane in the thunder of battle.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] says that three years ought to be long enough to find out the fact of insanity; but does he not see that it is ten years since the war closed and——

Mr. MAYNARD. How many patients are there in the asylum at present?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. About one hundred.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Nearly seven hundred.

Mr. GARFIELD. And we are asked this year to erect two more buildings, the existing buildings being so much overcrowded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Suppose there are seven thousand. Here we are called upon to undertake to make economy out of the insane soldiers of the Union Army. We are willing to buy pictures at $25,000 apiece or any other sum, but we are not willing to provide for the insane soldiers of the Union Army as they ought to be provided for.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Who put in the resolution directing the Committee on Appropriations to pay for these pictures if it was not done by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did it, but I did not mean to starve or filch it out of the fund necessary to provide for the insane Union soldiers.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But you wanted to buy pictures, and the House went back on you.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; it was ruled out on a point of order. I am willing to buy pictures, but I am not willing to buy pictures with one hand and filch the money out of the fund belonging to the soldiers with the other.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Do not put your bad trash on the Committee on Appropriations. When you pass resolutions directing the committee to buy pictures, do not blame the committee for reporting appropriations to carry out the resolution of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But you were not obliged to report it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We were directed to take steps to buy. I am glad the gentleman has called attention to it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It never occured to me that I was going to take it away from the insane soldiers.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I take it, Mr. Chairman, the same proportion of soldiers become insane as of other classes. Now, taking the basis of the population of Iowa (and we have made provision for taking care of our insane) I find there are in our two asylums one out of a thousand of the population. We had forty thousand soldiers in the Army and consequently we would send up forty insane persons. Suppose all the States were to send up their insane in the same proportion. Take the quota of the twenty-seven Union States and the quota from the Territories, and we would have about fifteen thousand insane sent up here. But I have no idea that Iowa or many of the States which have made abundant provision for their insane will ever send anybody up here. If they did, then we would have to make provision for fifteen thousand insane persons in addition. If, however, there are some States which have made no provision for insane soldiers, I am perfectly willing they should be sent up here to be taken care of in this asylum, for I believe our soldiers have a claim upon the Government as long as they live and their children after them.

Mr. CLYMER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. He made a statement that if we failed to pass this amendment it would turn out of the asylum about one hundred insane soldiers. Now if that be so, I am for the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That nothing in this clause shall operate to discharge any person now in said insane asylum.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us examine that when you get through.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you offer it as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. CLYMER. The amendment ought to be made to read "any soldier or seaman."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No man had a right to go into the insane asylum from the volunteer army until 1869. Therefore there was no volunteer soldier in there under the three-years clause. If you save men in there, why say the insane soldier coming in yesterday shall be kept in, and an insane soldier who to-morrow afternoon shall knock at the door shall be kept out? This is not economy, gentlemen. It is not even parsimony. It is not even niggardliness. It is simply sheer savage barbarity, nothing more and nothing else.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I offer it as an amendment to the original section to perfect it to save those in the hospital now.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments are offered as independent propositions to perfect the paragraph, and the question will first be taken on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Have the law read as it is now.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support, clothing, medical and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service and of all persons who may have become insane since their entry into the military or naval service of the United States and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAYNARD. What is the date of that law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is the law of last year and of this year, and is now in operation.

The amendment of Mr. MCDILL, of Wisconsin, was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. HALE, of Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. On the action just taken by the House there is no necessity to vote on mine, and I therefore withdraw it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the paragraph:

For the purpose of paying the State lunatic asylum for insane convicts at Auburn, New York, for the care of George Shephard and James Blomers, insane convicts, who became insane while undergoing sentence and who were kept and maintained in said asylum after their term of sentence had expired, the sum of $5,900.46.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks ananimous consent to return hereafter to this paragraph.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I object.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think it can be put in at a later stage.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum in Washington, District of Columbia, namely, for subsistence, salaries and compensation, fuel and light, clothing, rent of hospital buildings, medicines and medical supplies, forage and transportation, and miscellaneous expenses, $45,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 985 add the following:

For the immediate relief of the suffering poor of the District of Columbia, to be distributed by the commissioners of said District, $10,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for the reading of the letter which I send to the desk, and which explains this amendment.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I would ask the Chair if this is not obnoxious to the point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to reserve the point until he hears the letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL SAVINGS-BANK,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1875.

DEAR SIR: The appalling destitution now prevalent in this District constrains me, in behalf of the citizens' relief commission, to urge Congress to come to our aid.

The committee addressed a letter to our Delegate several days since earnestly soliciting assistance, but nothing appears to have been done. If members of Congress knew the situation as we who have been endeavoring to relieve it, no appeal or argument would be necessary. I inclose a statement of what we have done the past two months:

We need for Washington	$6,000 00
For the county	2,000 00
For Georgetown	2,000 00

With this we can relieve the present exigencies. Probably nothing more can be expected from our local government.

Mr. Solomons, who will present this note, is actively engaged in the work and knows from actual observation the demands upon us.

Hoping action may be taken quickly and the horrors of starvation in our midst avoided,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. STICKNEY,
President Citizens' Relief Commission.
A. S. SOLOMONS,
Vice-President.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman, &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to make a single remark, I will say that there is now in this District, its government having been abolished, no authority for any officer to pay any money out of any fund whatever for the relief of the poor. There is no poor-law, and the amount of suffering reported to the Committee on Appropriations by the citizens' relief committee is something very distressing indeed. We determined therefore to report this amendment to the House for its action. I suppose it can be ruled out if the point of order is insisted on.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I withdraw the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 985 add the following:

For the discharge of the debts upon and for the completion of the hospital building of the Little Sisters of the Poor, in the city of Washington, $8,500, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. That there is no law to authorize it.

Mr. FORT. I hope there will be no objection made to this appropriation. There is a charitable association in this city——

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I would like to have the Chair's decision on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] state whether there is any law authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. RANDALL. There was none for the other which has just been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order on the previous amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the point of order against this will not be insisted on.

Mr. FORT. Last session of Congress an appropriation was made of $25,000 for the purpose of constructing this building. I have not the law before me now, but that was done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if this hospital is under the charge and direction of the Government of the United States? Are they responsible for it?

Mr. FORT. I was going to state how that was. This is the same hospital for which an appropriation was made last session of $25,000, and it occurs to me that it is so far recognized as being a public institution that the objection will not come within the rule. An appropriation has already been made for this very building.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It was made as a gift.

Mr. FORT. The building is now unfinished. There is a debt upon it and those who have that charity in charge are compelled to ask alms for its support, which they propose to do. But they will not be able to liquidate this debt that is upon the building, and I think we cannot do better than appropriate this sum of money for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I remember we made an appropriation last session of some amount for this institution at the instance of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. FORT. As I have already stated, we appropriated $25,000 for the building.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I understand that last winter we made a present of $25,000 to this institution conducted by the Sisters of the Catholic Church, and I think we have done enough.

Mr. CROOKE. It is perfectly understood that they confine their charity to the Catholic Church.

Mr. RANDALL. It is free as the air. If the gentleman wants to make a sectarian objection, that is one thing. But I say here that any Protestant can go into that institution. It is not any more private than the one you have just appropriated for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has attempted to get some information to enable him to rule upon the point of order, but as yet has not been able to obtain it.

Mr. FORT. At the last session of Congress this was so far recognized as being a public institution that $25,000 was appropriated for erecting a building. A building has been erected and there is now a debt of some $8,000 upon it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I only wish to say a word upon this. I do not care what the result is. This association, which is of a purely private character, came here last year for a gift. Congress gave them $25,000 to remove a debt and to complete their building. That is all there is of it. If that is warrant for a new appropriation, then of course the point of order does not lie. But that is the whole fact.

Mr. FORT. I would like to have the law read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the law be read, after which I desire to say a word.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Little Sisters of the Poor of Washington City, to liquidate a debt on the building and to complete said building, $25,000.

Mr. FORT. This is in continuation of that law, to complete that building and to pay off that debt.

Mr. STORM. If that is sufficient warrant, then after this when Congress makes a present to any society one year it will have to renew the appropriation ever afterward.

Mr. GARFIELD. When the appropriation was moved last year I did not at that time see my way to favor it, looking upon this as a special institution under one religious denomination; but I was overruled. But I was overruled, and I was very glad to know that the story that went around through the press to the effect that the money appropriated by Congress had been used, not to build a hospital, but a chapel was contradicted. I took pains to have inquiries made, and gentlemen will find in the report of the committee accompanying this bill a letter from the sister superior of this institution informing me that the money paid by the Government was employed wholly on the hospital part of the building, and that although there is a chapel in the building it is to be built by private subscription, and that no part of the money appropriated by the Government for the benefit of this institution was to be used for that purpose. I call attention to the fact that the money was given last year to complete the hospital building as a gift, and that it constitutes no claim upon Congress for further appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule upon the point of order. Nothing has been produced to satisfy the Chair that this hospital is at all under the authority of the United States, and the Chair therefore rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. FORT. I move then that the committee rise for the purpose of moving in the House that the rules be suspended so as to make this amendment in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can do that at the end of the bill just as well as he can now, and I hope he will withdraw that motion to save time.

Mr. FORT. I will withdraw the motion for the present, but I give notice that I shall offer it in the House.

Mr. STONE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know if it is in order to move to reconsider the vote by which we adopted the amendment appropriating $10,000 which was offered just now by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD?]

The CHAIRMAN. That paragraph has been passed.

Mr. STONE. Will the Chair please answer my question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that it is not in order.

Mr. BROMBERG. I desire to move to amend the paragraph in relation to the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum in Washington.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order. We have passed that paragraph. I make the point of order that a new paragraph has been inserted since that paragraph was passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee has already determined to put in an additional paragraph following the paragraph which the gentleman seeks to amend, and therefore his amendment is not in order.

Mr. BROMBERG. One moment. I understand that those were amendments to the paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; they were new paragraphs to the bill.

Mr. BROMBERG. Then I move to strike out the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. BROMBERG. On what ground?

The CHAIRMAN. On the ground that you cannot move to strike out what the committee has already determined to put in.

Mr. WOOD. The Chair has never submitted the question to the committee on agreeing to that paragraph with the amendment added to it.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not necessary for the Chair to put the question on the paragraph as amended, for the amendment was in the nature of a new paragraph.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Has an amendment been inserted after the paragraph in relation to the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman that it has.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For Rock Island bridge: For care and preservation of the bridge, $13,000; and this sum and the appropriation for said bridge for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, shall be expended in accordance with the joint resolution in relation to the Rock Island bridge, approved July 20, 1868, and the contract between the United States and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company; and the Secretary of War shall, within six months from the pasage of this act, notify said railroad company to remove front said island and from the Mississippi River all piers, abutments, embankments, erections, structures, or tracks connected in any way with the old bridge or tracks of said railroad company over or across said island or either branch of said river; and in case of refusal of said railroad company to comply with such notice for the period of six months, then it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to commence or cause to be commenced such legal proceedings against said railroad company as may be necessary to protect and enforce the rights of the United States in that behalf.

Mr. COTTON. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of that paragraph:

Provided, however, The Secretary of War may permit the northern pier of the old bridge to remain in accordance with the joint resolution of Congress approved March 3, 1873.

The law under which this bridge was built required the old bridge to be removed within six months and that the new bridge should be completed. About the time the new bridge was completed the Board of Trade of Davenport, Iowa, adopted a resolution asking Congress to permit the northern pier of the old bridge to stand as a protection to their levee, it being in such a position as to serve as a good protection to the harbor of Davenport. In pursuance of that I procured the passage through Congress of a resolution permitting the Secretary of War in his discretion to let the old pier stand if it did not prove an obstruction to navigation. Now, this provision requires every obstruction to be removed absolutely, and would effectually repeal that resolution and require the removal of the pier of the old bridge. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who represents the opposite shore of the river, and who, I understand, prepared this provision of the bill, has seen this amendment and has no desire to interfere with the resolution to which I have referred. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] in whose district this bridge is, has taken special interest in this matter, has appeared before the committee upon it, and was very largely instrumental in drawing up this paragraph. If, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] says, he has consulted with the gentleman from Illinois, and both sides are represented here, and no harm will be done to the Government, and it seems to me none can be done, there is no objection to the amendment

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For Benicia arsenal, California: For one carpenter's shop, $35,000,

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to give us some information about this item. It is for a new work, and it seems to me that $35,000 is a very large sum for a carpenter's shop.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that two or three years ago the Committee on Appropriations undertook a pretty thorough reform in reference to our arsenals. We had at that time twenty-three arsenals; we were appropriating large sums specifically to each arsenal. After a very thorough overhauling of that subject the committee reported to the House a plan for keeping up the continuous construction of three of these great arsenals; one for the Atlantic coast, one for the Mississippi Valley, and one for the Pacific coast. For all the other arsenals we gave a sufficient sum simply to keep the property from wasting. That rule has been followed ever since.

The arsenal on the Pacific coast is at Benicia, California. They need there an arsenal for construction and repair. Although we give them only about one-fourth of what is estimated for, we give them what is the most necessary, a carpenter's shop, where they can make wooden machinery for constructing the other part of the arsenal, and also the carpenter-work for the other parts of the arsenal.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the following:

To enable the Secretary of War to purchase Gatling guns for the armament of fortifications, $50,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is a clerical error in this paragraph which I ask to have corrected. The words "armament of fortifications" should read "Army and Navy." That is as the committee agreed upon it; it was put in this way by mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For conversion and rifling of heavy guns, $75,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend for this purpose an additional sum of $100,000 out of specific appropriations heretofore made for forts in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876," approved February 10, 1875, to be taken pro rata from the amount appropriated for said forts. And hereafter the chief clerk of the Ordnance Department of the Army shall be held accountable for the ordnance stores and similar material deposited in the museum, and shall receive the compensation of an ordnance store-keeper, and be subject to the same laws and regulations.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Before I move to amend this paragraph I desire to ask a question of the gentleman who has this bill in charge. At the beginning of this paragraph I find these words: "For conversion and rifling of heavy guns, $75,000." As I understand it, these guns are converted from smooth-bores into rifles; hence the word "rifling" is surperfluous and unnecessary. I would suggest in place of the word "rifling" the word "tests," so that it will read "for conversion and tests of heavy guns." The word "rifling" does not mean anything; the word "convert" or "conversion" covers the whole ground.

Mr. GARFIELD. There were two things requested of the Committee on Appropriations. One was that we make a very large appropriation for the purpose of converting guns from smooth-bore to rifled guns, enlarging their caliber somewhat, then putting in a jacket of steel, bringing them to a still smaller bore than at first, and then rifling them. The other was an appropriation for experiments; and those experiments, I think, will have the direction to which the gentleman refers more than anything else.

The committee heard the Chief of Engineers, and were of the opinion that we ought to allow the conversion of these guns, and that we ought not to appropriate a large sum of money for experiments. We have been year by year appropriating money for experiments, and the Chief of Engineers informs us that we have not yet reached a method of converting guns that they thought was thoroughly successful. We believed that it would be better to go on and make guns for our armaments than to go on and expend two or three hundred thousand dollars annually for making tests, which are very expensive. What is the use of making a test if we never use it after we have declared it to be satisfactory? The committee were willing to appropriate money for making guns, but not the larger sum asked for making tests.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Why use both terms, "conversion" and "rifling?"

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Conversion means rifling.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not necessarily. It does in this connection, because the appropriation is for the conversion of smooth-bores into rifled guns; that is the intent and object of it.

Mr. BROMBERG. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BROMBERG. I understood the Chair to rule that after a section was read the Chair would not allow a motion to go back to the beginning to amend it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so rule.

Mr. BROMBERG. Did not the Chair rule that an amendment was out of order because the whole section had been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama was out of order for the reason that the provision he moved to strike out had been added by the Committee of the Whole, and it was not competent to move to strike out what the committee had already inserted.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. My amendment is to strike out "rifling" and insert "tests."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The word "rifling" carries out the intention of the Committee on Appropriations, which is to make this provision definitive, so that whatever conversion of guns may be done shall be in the direction of rifling and none other. The insertion of the word "tests" would subject this appropriation to an objection that has been made to certain other appropriations. There have been certain tests made upon which money has been expended in the Departments, and I believe uselessly. There are certain patents; there is a Norman Wiard patent which I never believed in. I believe it is a humbug, and that the money expended on it has been wasted. The Committee on Appropriations, at least I as one member of the committee, do not want this word "rifling" struck out and the word "tests" put in so that these expensive performances in the way of ingenious trials shall be made by an expenditure of Government funds. One object is that the money shall be used in converting these old Rodman guns into rifled guns under the direction of the War Department. Let us have no more money expended in tests.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. If it is merely proposed by the committee to convert the smooth-bores now belonging to the Government into rifled guns, then the word "conversion" is sufficient to cover that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the word "rifling" do any harm?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It may be construed to cover other guns. Suppose we say "for conversion and rifling of heavy guns belonging to the Government."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is no objection to that.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Is it too late to make a point of order on the paragraph? My point is that the appropriations for forts along the coast have already been made. This proposition is to change existing law by converting to another purpose an appropriation already made.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That point is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, if good at any time, is not good now. As the question has already been discussed, it is too late to raise the point of order.

Mr. COBURN. I move to amend by striking out the last word of the paragraph.

The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] is, in my judgment, improper. The Committee on Military Affairs had this matter under consideration upon a recommendation from the President and the Secretary of War; and it was understood in our committee that one hundred and forty of these guns could be converted into rifled guns for $250,000. Here is the language of the Chief of Ordnance:

> I have, therefore, the honor to recommend that an appropriation of $250,000 be made by Congress for converting smooth-bore guns into rifles by lining with wrought iron or steel. The above sum will enable us to convert at least one hundred and forty guns.

Nothing was said about tests. Nobody here, I presume, wants to be going on with these expensive experiments. Enough money has been spent for such purposes. Half of those projects are infamous speculations and swindles. We have been engaged in such things entirely too long; and I venture to say that our democratic friends when they come into power in this House will not let two years pass without some investigation into some of these things. They may do as they please about it, however.

I regard no expenditure of the Government as more wasteful and reprehensible than these appropriations for testing cannon and making experiments in relation to them. While I make no charges against the Ordnance Office, I do say that it is a useless, extravagant, and foolish way of spending money. The President, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Ordnance all say that we can take these large cast-iron cannon and convert them cheaply into the best kind of ordnance. That is what the Chief of Ordnance asks; that is what the Secretary of War asks; it is what the President asks.

I submit an extract from a special message of the President of the United States on this subject:

> These views gain increased strength and pertinence as the years roll by, and I have now again the honor to call special attention to the condition of the "armament of our fortifications," and the absolute necessity for immediate provision by Congress for the procurement of heavy cannon. The large expenditures required to supply the number of guns for our forts is the strongest argument that can be adduced for a liberal annual appropriation for their gradual accumulation. In time of war such preparations cannot be made, cannon cannot be purchased in open market, nor manufactured at short notice; they must be the product of years of experience and labor.
> I herewith inclose copies of a report of the Chief of Ordnance and of a board of ordnance officers on the trial of an 8-inch rifle converted from a 10-inch smooth-bore, which shows very conclusively an economical means of utilizing these useless smooth-bores and making them into 8-inch rifles capable of piercing seven inches of iron. The 1,294 10-inch Rodman guns should, in my opinion, be so utilized, and the appropriation requested by the Chief of Ordnance of $250,000 to commence these conversions is urgently recommended.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.] The Army and Navy Journal seems to criticise this appropriation as being made for the benefit of one Norman Wiard, of whom we have heard a great deal.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman did not hear the statement I made a moment ago, that the object of the Committee on Appropriations in adopting the language of the bill was to prevent this money from going in that direction, so that the Department would take these old cannon belonging to the Government and rifle them without spending any more money in this wool-gathering performance of Norman Wiard.

Mr. COBURN. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I renew it. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] where this work is to be done—whether it is to be done by some private individual or in the workshops of the Government?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. The object is (and if anybody has any doubt on the question, I have no objection to inserting a clause which shall make it explicit) that this work shall be done in our own workshops by the Government itself; that there shall be no more experiments, no more tests, no more Norman Wiard follies. Let the language be made as strong as you please to cover that point.

The question recurred on Mr. ALBRIGHT'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move to insert in line 1052 the words "the work to be done at the Government arsenals by the Government."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to strike out all after the word "dollars" in line 1055 down to line 1066, as follows:

> Out of specific appropriations heretofore made for forts in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876," approved February 10, 1875, to be taken pro rata from the amount appropriated for said forts. And hereafter the chief clerk of the Ordnance Department of the Army shall be held accountable for the ordnance stores and similar material deposited in the museum, and shall receive the compensation of an ordnance store-keeper, and be subject to the same laws and regulations.

That, Mr. Chairman, takes money from one appropriation and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend an additional sum of $100,000 out of other appropriations. There was appropriated only $650,000 for fortifications, and this takes away $100,000, so you have left only $550,000 for that purpose. I understand the appropriations have been cut down very much already. Say if you wish to appropriate $100,000 for this purpose, but do not take it from appropriations where the money is needed.

I desire to say furthermore that I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask for this amendment striking out the words I have indicated.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to this committee that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] has been directed by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Military Affairs to make this amendment striking out the words which propose to take away from the appropriations for all the forts along the Atlantic coast pro rata and to allow the Secretary of War to use the money in testing guns——

Mr. GARFIELD. Not for testing guns—not a dollar is given for the purpose of testing guns.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. What is it for?

Mr. GARFIELD. For rifling.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I oppose it. Not in the previous paragraph but in the previous three lines you have appropriated $75,000 for rifling. The Military Committee investigated this subject, and I hope this committee will adopt the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.] It is right and proper the appropriations should remain undisturbed which have already been made for the fortifications along the coast.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I withdraw the amendment and the gentleman from Connecticut will renew it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, since this matter was acted on in the Committee on Appropriations I have been in consultation with gentlemen of the Engineer and Ordnance Corps. It is proposed to take from the small amount appropriated for fortifications $100,000. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has well observed, the appropriation now is only $600,000. In other words, this proposes to take 15 or 16 per cent. away from that small appropriation. Many of the appropriations for fortifications were only five, ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars. These appropriations were made several months ago. The appropriations for the same purpose were never so small as this year. Since they were made and became the law the Engineer Corps have gone on acting upon the presumption, as they had the right to do, that the money was to be expended as it was appropriated, for this purpose only. I can say for the Engineer Corps they deprecate entirely the interference of another Department—the Ordnance Department—and I can say for the Ordnance Corps they would much rather have a separate appropriation than be brought into collision with the Engineer Corps.

As I have said, the engineers have acted on the presumption they were entitled to it and that no other Department of the Government would come in and take away so large a percentage of their appropriation. I therefore hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be passed upon favorably.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Let me say a word.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will make a brief statement and then yield the floor to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I have not yet finished. Besides, these rifled guns spoken of are not fitted for fortifications. The Engineer Corps and Ordnance Corps agree that the small guns they are rifling are not the guns which are wanted upon these fortifications. They want heavier guns. They do not ask for an appropriation for that purpose this year, but when they do get them they want some heavy guns for the purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say simply this: The Committee on Appropriations have for several years been of the opinion that we were appropriating for fortifications a sum of money which is useless unless they are mounted with heavy guns. We thought because we could not appropriate the large sum necessary for both purposes, and as we thought heavy guns come in later than fortifications, we would give $75,000 out of the Treasury and allow $100,000 of the sum we appropriated for fortifications, to be used in arming fortifications, in making heavy 8-inch rifles to be put into them. I thought it was wise. They are both under the Secretary of War. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I think the committee was legislating under a mistake when it adopted the amendment that the work should be done in the Government arsenals. In agreeing to this it was legislating without knowledge. The Government has not a single machine fit to rifle these heavy guns; and it would cost anywhere from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars to erect the machinery.

And there is another mistake in the idea that Norman Wiard has anything to do with this. He has nothing to do with it under the sun. Our best ordnance officers are doing this. By appropriations heretofore made you have permitted them to prepare eight guns bored out, lined with steel tubes, rifled, breach-loading and muzzle-loading, for experimental purposes. One of them they have tested, and five more of them are nearly finished. But they do not want to go to work expending heavy sums on rifling smooth-bore guns in general until they are satisfied the thing will work. You do not need to give them the whole $175,000 for converting guns. Better give $75,000 of it for converting guns and $100,000 to finish their experiments with the seven or eight guns you authorized them to make. It costs seventy-five dollars to fire a shot. These eight-inch guns will pierce the heaviest iron-clad.

You have got the whole subject in a muss. What is wanted first is an appropriation for completing the experiments with these eight rifled guns.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on Mr. ALBRIGHT'S amendment, there were—ayes 70, noes 25.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. GARFIELD. This amendment increases the appropriation $100,000.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 92.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I believe now that the paragraph stands as it is in the printed bill, and I wish to offer an amendment to it. But I desire first to ask unanimous consent to strike out the words already adopted requiring this work to be done in the arsenals. I state on the authority of one of the highest ordnance officers that there is no machinery in the Government arsenals to do this, and that it would require an additional $50,000 at least to supply the machinery. It is now done by contract with the Cold Spring factory and other establishments. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the amendment in relation to that.

There was no objection, and the amendment was stricken out.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Now I have an amendment to move. There has been no change made in the paragraph at all. It stands now as it is in the printed bill. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 1054 strike out the words "this purpose" and insert "testing the experimental guns authorized by existing law."

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That will let you spend $75,000 in actually converting guns. It will give the Ordnance Department what it wants to finish all experiments on the eight rifled guns made under the law of a year or two ago.

Mr. COBURN. I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot go back to that section.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. We are on that section now.

I wish the committee to understand me, and I am afraid it does not. The Ordnance Department does not ask you to do what you seem to be determined to do. It does not ask you to waste your money in that way. It is not ready to spend three or four hundred thousand dollars in actually converting guns. You have given them already and they have spent a large sum of money in rifling guns of various sizes. One of them they have fired five hundred times. Five of the others are about done. If they can finish the seven, and you let them have this $100,000, they will test the life of the guns. There is no use in spending this money until you have tried how the guns will stand it, and if it will pay to go on. They have fired one gun to death already.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Who fired it to death?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The Ordnance Department.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Not Norman Wiard?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No. This has nothing to do with Norman Wiard.

Mr. COBURN. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that within the last six weeks we have had a special message from the President of the United States, which created some little alarm in the country at the time, asking not for $250,000 to make experiments, but expressly asking in the first part of the message that we give $250,000 to convert these cannon into rifled cannon. That is the very thing that he asks shall be done by experiment. Now the gentleman from Connecticut says that we are getting the cart before the horse, and proposing to make guns before we make experiments. In the name of sense, why is it then that the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau and the President of the United States ask that rifled guns be made instead of the experiments? We are not putting the cart before the horse. The House does understand itself. The House is doing right when it says let us go on and make these rifled guns. The Chief of Ordnance says that it will take this $250,000 to convert two hundred and forty of the large guns into rifled guns; and if he means anything, and if there is any sense in the recommendation, if he is fit for his place, if he is a scientific officer and tells the truth, we ought to go on and manufacture these rifled guns.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to strike out the last word, and I propose to have read what the ordnance officer says on the subject of the experiments. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked in the document I have sent up.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is expected that by the opening of spring eight guns varying in caliber from eight to twelve inches, and in weight from sixteen thousand to eighty-five thousand pounds, will be ready for firing. The firing of a 12-inch rifle is a very expensive business, each round fired costing about $100. As the gun may stand five hundred rounds, its trial will cost $50,000, and only in a less degree will the expense be in the trial of guns of smaller caliber.

Funds necessary for this purpose should be appropriated; and, added to this, a sum sufficient to provide all the carriages, depressing and others, butts and platforms, and all the appliances, conveniences, and labor required for the prosecution of such exact and important work.

I know of no military or naval power that has not provided an experimental and proving ground with every facility for conducting trials upon a grand scale; and there is no way of avoiding considerable expenditure, while seeking and obtaining the necessary data from which to draw conclusions, that will lead to such large expenditures in the future in arming our fortifications.

I have, therefore, the honor to recommend that an appropriation of $250,000 be made for proving ground and experiments and tests of heavy ordnance.

* * * * * * *

The strong assurances offered by our experiments that additional experimental guns of the heaviest caliber now fabricated by civilized nations, constructed on the principle of combining cast iron with wrought iron or steel lining tubes, and after judicious and well-authenticated and matured plans, approved by the Department, will, when tested, give successful results, and prove that an effective, durable, and economical rifle armament can be secured, lead the board to submit the additional recommendation that Congress be asked to appropriate an adequate sum for further experiments and tests, and especially for the manufacture, trial, and test of one 10 and one 12-inch experimental rifle, to be constructed in accordance with the general plan above suggested.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I hold in my hand a list of the guns that are not tested yet, guns that the Government has procured; and unless an appropriation is made for testing them, they will be practically of no value.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twelve-inch gun, Thompson breech-loader.
Nine-inch gun, Sutcliffe breech-loader.
Nine-inch gun, Woodbridge.
Nine-inch gun, Hitchcock's.
Nine-inch gun, converted, steel tube.
Eight-inch gun, converted, steel tube.
Nine-inch gun, converted, wrought iron tube.
Eight-inch gun, converted, (partially tested.)

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Now, I only wish to say that if no means are to be taken to test these guns, what was the object of buying them and having them made? Why should we let them lie idle and not test them?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Notwithstanding what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] says, I reiterate that I understand this subject. I do not know a great deal about it myself, but I get my information ten seconds before I utter it from the assistant chief of the Ordnance Department, who tells me substantially what I am saying here. Here is a proposition to test the guns, and here is a proposed appropriation for the purchase of guns. One is the cart and the other the horse. If the experiments in testing did not show that the guns were worth anything, then other money would not be expended for the conversion. I insist, therefore, upon my amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division there were ayes 54, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. I move to strike out all after the word "forts," in line 106, as follows:

And hereafter the chief clerk of the Ordnance Department of the Army shall be held accountable for the ordnance stores and similar material deposited in the museum, and shall receive the compensation of an ordnance store-keeper, and be subject to the same laws and regulations.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I call for tellers on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER,] and he has submitted an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Well, the House is insisting that the Ordnance Department shall spend money in a manner and for a purpose that it is not yet fully ready for.

Mr. SPEER. I have offered my amendment for the purpose of saying that I think there is a small mouse in this meal-tub. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the effect of the last clause of this paragraph which I have moved to strike out, commencing after the word "forts," is not to increase the pay of the chief clerk of the Ordnance Department about $600 a year, without imposing on him any additional duties?

Mr. GARFIELD. When I introduced that it was on the recommendation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and I supposed it merely adjusted a difficulty of position. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] is right, and that it ought to be stricken out; and I will vote with him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I now move to strike out the second sentence of this paragraph.

The sentence referred to was as follows:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend for this purpose an additional sum of $100,000, out of specific appropriations heretofore made for forts in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876," approved February 10, 1875, to be taken pro rata from the amount appropriated for said forts.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. When I made my remarks before, it was on the supposition that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER]——

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. Has not the committee already refused to strike out that portion of the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has refused to strike out certain portions of it, and the motion now is to strike out the whole of the sentence.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania made his amendment I supposed he included in it all that I have now proposed to strike out.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman state what is his amendment?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It is to strike out of the paragraph all except the words "for conversion and rifling of heavy guns, $75,000."

Mr. SPEER. I agree with that, and think it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. When I made my remarks before I supposed the gentleman from Pennsylvania covered by his amendment that which I now move to strike out. I have but to repeat what I said before. We made this year the smallest appropriations for fortifications that we have made for years; less than we made last year, less than one-third of what we made the year before that, and less than one-third of what we made the year before that. There was no appropriation in the whole lot exceeding twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars, and many of the items were for only five or ten thousand dollars. This portion of this paragraph which I desire to strike out proposes to take away from the small appropriations we have made for fortifications the sum of $100,000.

When that appropriation bill was signed by the President I happen to know that the Engineer Department of the Government went forward with the expectation of relying upon those small sums; they make their arrangements accordingly. Now it is proposed that we shall come in here and take away what we granted them by a previous bill, take away such an amount that they will not be enabled to carry into effect many of their contracts already made and in contemplation, and next year we will have little dribblets coming in here to cover the 15 or 20 per cent. which we now propose to take away from them by this paragraph.

Besides that, this paragraph requires the Ordnance Department to go to the Engineer Department, to trench upon their ground. That is what neither of these Departments desire; if they have anything they want it to themselves, subject to their own arrangement. I hope this portion of the paragraph will be stricken out.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I rise to say that some of my friends misunderstood the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.] The amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] I think should be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] has shown this House a way out of the dilemma into which we seem to have placed ourselves. The military men and skilled gentlemen in gun matters do not seem to know what they themselves want. I think, therefore, the House had much better adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut, strike out of this paragraph what he proposes, and thus save to the Government $100,000 until these military men and these mechanics skilled in making guns shall understand themselves sufficiently to intelligently instruct us.

The amendment was agreed to upon a division, ayes 78, noes not counted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to insert in this paragraph in place of what has been stricken out that which I understand will meet the wishes of the Ordnance Department, and also the recommendations of the President of the United States. I move to insert as follows:

For continuing experiments and tests of heavy rifled ordnance under existing laws, $100,000.

That is the amount that was stricken out, and I understand that meets the wishes of the Ordnance Bureau.

Mr. GARFIELD. But not of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause an examination to be made into the condition of the United States arsenals east of the Mississippi River and to report to the next Congress how many of the same can be sold without interfering with the necessities of the military service, together with an estimate of the amount that can probably be realized from the sale of such of the same whenever such sale shall be directed by Congress.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I make the point of order that this provision was all attended to last year, and is superfluous in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. KELLOGG. Why is this paragraph put in here?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move a formal amendment, to strike out the last word, in order to say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. YOUNG] that this clause goes further than the provision of the act of last year. This clause provides that the Secretary shall not only make examination as to the sale of useless arsenal property, but shall submit to Congress an estimate of what can be realized from the sale of that property. Some of it is quite valuable and will bring a large sum. The Secretary cannot sell and will not sell between now and the next session of Congress. But it is well to know about what the property is worth.

Mr. COX. What arsenals are they and where are they located?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot give the whole list; but the Committee on Appropriations believe from examination that only three or four are needed, whereas there are now some fifteen or twenty.

Mr. CONGER. The word "such" where it first occurs in line 1074 should be "each;" so as to read "from the sale of each of the same." I move that amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I offer the following amendment:

That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to dispose of the useless ordnance material on hand at public sale, according to law, the net proceeds of which shall be turned into the Treasury; and an amount equal to the same is hereby appropriated to be applied to the purpose of securing a supply of material adapted in manufacture and caliber to the present wants of the service; that there shall be expended under this provision not more than $75,000 in one year; and in case of sale of like materials in the War Department the proceeds shall be turned into the Treasury and an amount equal to the net proceeds of such sale is hereby appropriated for the purpose of procuring a supply of material adapted in manufacture and caliber to the present wants of the war service, and there shall be expended in the War Department under this provision not more than $75,000 in any one year.

I presume there is no objection to this amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I make the point of order that it changes existing law.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It does not change existing law.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Is the Secretary of War already authorized to do this?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. He is.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Then why is this provision necessary?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This is guarded so that whenever the Secretary of War makes sales in accordance with the acts of Congress heretofore passed, the money shall be not used by the Department but turned into the Treasury. Besides that, we provide a limit so that in any one year there shall not be used out of this fund arising from the sale of old or useless material more than $75,000; and that we appropriate in terms.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to amend by striking out the whole paragraph. My reason for offering this amendment is that I believe this provision is altogether superfluous in this bill. The facts developed in the investigation concerning these arsenals can all be found in the report of the Chief of Ordnance.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I hope this paragraph will be retained just as the Committee on Appropriations have reported it. During this session and the last, some dozen or more applications have been made for donations of these arsenals. Those applications were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and investigated by me personally. Unless we adopt some such measure as is here proposed and provide for the sale of these arsenals, they may be given away from time to time, and for useless purposes, the Government losing in this way some hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions of dollars, in the aggregate. The Committee on Military Affairs during the last session and the present have in every case voted adversely upon these applications. They think that the right way is for the Government to sell these arsenals and turn the money into the Treasury.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. Ought there not to be some limit as to the expenses that may be incurred in making these investigations?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There has been a partial examination already, and no expense has been incurred. Officers are detailed to do this duty and report to the Secretary of War.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the paragraph authorize the Secretary of War to employ any persons, whether in the Army or not, to make this examination?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. No head of a Department, under such a clause, would ever go outside of the force of his Department.

Mr. SPEER. Could he not do it under the language here used?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This is a duty laid upon the War Department; and as there is no appropriation whatever, there is no danger that such expenses will be incurred. The examination has already been made in part and by officers of the Army. I assure the gentleman that it will be so done in the future.

Mr. SPEER. Very well; I accept the gentleman's assurance on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIGNAL OFFICE.

Observation and report of storms: For expenses of the observation and report of storms by telegraph and signals, for the benefit of commerce and agriculture throughout the United States; for manufacture, purchase, or repair of meteorological and other necessary instruments; for telegraphing reports; for expenses of storm-signals, announcing probable approach and force of storms; for continuing the establishment and connection of stations at life-saving stations and light-houses; for instrument-shelters; for hire, furniture, and expenses of offices maintained for public use in cities or ports receiving reports; for river reports; for maps and bulletins to be displayed in chambers of commerce and boards of trade rooms and for distribution; for books and stationery; and for incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, $385,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding:

Provided, That no expenditure shall be made or obligation incurred for any amount in excess of the sum hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADDELL. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph, as amended, the following:

Thirty thousand dollars of which shall be expended on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Hatteras.

It is well known to every member of the House that the portion of the Atlantic coast specified in my amendment is one of its most dangerous parts. I know from personal experience that vessels with valuable cargoes and also human lives have been frequently lost for want of knowledge in the city of Wilmington, where I reside, that a wreck had occurred. If we had a single station of this kind so that information could be sent in time to secure relief, valuable property as well as human life might often be saved. Hence I think a portion of this fund ought to be appropriated to signal stations south of Cape Hatteras.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we ought not to adopt this amendment. We cannot here in Congress enter into a matter of administration like this.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, if this marvelous system of following the storms that endanger the lives of our sailors, and at the same time influence agriculture, is to be kept up as it has been begun, a much larger appropriation than that proposed here will be required if any considerable portion of the money is to be diverted to new places.

Now, there is one objection to the amendment of the gentleman. Almost every dangerous storm on the South Atlantic coast comes from the ocean. The misfortune is there are no islands east and southeast of these ports where we have telegraph signal stations, or from which we can get any indication of a coming storm. Therefore the expenditure in that direction will be useless. We must avail ourselves of observations where there may be stations to foretell the coming storms. All the storms dangerous on the South Atlantic coast come from the east and southeast, and we can have no appropriation until we strike the coast, and signal stations are not desirable there beyond what are already given and given by this appropriation.

Mr. WADDELL. I should be glad to have the appropriation increased, but I do not ask for that. I wish that only a part of the money shall be applied to this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] to change his amendment. I agree to the desirableness of what he wishes to attain, and I do not think it is appropriated for. If he will offer it so there shall be $30,000 added, I will vote for it with pleasure. And I will tell you the reason why. I agree to what the gentleman from Michigan has said. The matter he wishes to meet is this: not to foretell when a storm is coming, as there is no such system of harbors and stations along the coast where notice can be given by storm signals as on the northern coast. That system should be extended along the southern coast. I think $30,000 would be little enough, and I wish the House would for that purpose allow an appropriation of $30,000 simply to extend the stations where storm signals can be thrown out by telegraphic communication. That would cost on an average seven or eight thousand dollars, giving seven or eight signal stations.

This system is admirable in detecting storms and preventing the mariner getting into trouble, especially where there are no lines of harbors as in the North. I speak with considerable feeling, as I have been twice wrecked on that coast myself.

Mr. WADDELL. I am obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I should like to make my amendment that way. I was only afraid I could not get an increase.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out "$385,000" and make it "$415,000," $30,000 of which shall be expended on the southern coast.

Mr. WADDELL. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, in regard to that amendment I wish to call the attention of the House to what I think is a dangerous thing to do in a good cause. I have seen several things since I have been a member of Congress so popular that all anybody had to do was to ask and it went on, and so it continued until the reaction came, and that thing was thrown down by the violence of the recoil. We commenced by giving $25,000 for this purpose. It was opposed, but it won its way. We gave $50,000 the next year, and then it went up to $100,000, and then to $200,000 the next year, and next to $300,000, until now it has finally got up to $385,000. But that, Mr. Chairman, does not represent one-half the cost of the signal service. The Chief of the Signal Office was before us the other day, and we asked what was the entire cost of the signal service, considering the pay of the persons in the employ of that Department, they being paid upon the Army pay-roll, and he told us the total cost was $800,000 a year. You have now an establishment within the War Department on the subject of reporting storms that costs the Government $800,000 a year. We have ourselves put it up $10,000 above what it was last year. The estimate was higher than last year, and we have gone above the estimate. If $30,000 should be added, it is an increase of 20 per cent., almost 30 per cent. of the total amount last year, and this does not show one-half the cost. I hope when a thing is doing so well you will not overdo it and by and by bring reaction and overthrow it all. I do not believe we should go a step further than we have gone in this bill. I have no doubt the Chief Signal Officer, if the facts are presented to him and they are good facts, will take off some lines less important and put on this one now asked for. I think this is as important a line if not more important than some now established. We have the opportunity and the right to establish the service the gentleman asks for by reducing in other places. That I think he ought to do. But I ask gentlemen not to go on in this way plunging this signal service several bow-shots beyond what was ever done before. If this is voted, the service will cost you $1,000,000 next year.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to say a single word. The saving of one single steamship, to say nothing of the sice. I want, and property, will pay the whole cost of the signal servd one steamtherefore, to see this thing extended. If you have saved one steamship that otherwise would have been lost, you save more in the goods than what the signal service costs, besides hundreds of valuable lives.

Mr. ROBBINS. I cheerfully support this amendment in order to provide this additional service on the coast; and I call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the arrangement of the signal stations there is a great vacancy in that part of the country which I represent. If you take the stations of Lynchburgh and Augusta and Knoxville and Wilmington, there is an immense area of nearly three States included between these four stations that ought to have a signal station, the central point being about Salisbury, North Carolina. I hope the amendment will be adopted, that we may have not only an additional station on the coast but an additional station in the country, say at Salisbury, for I believe the chief officer of the signal service will establish one there if there is an appropriation. I have had correspondence with him, and believe he will do so if the means are allowed him for the purpose.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been proposed and debate on it is exhausted. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL.]

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has not put the question on the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not do so because it was merely formal.

Mr. CONGER. And because of that formal amendment I could not offer another.

The question was then put on the pro forma amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move an amendment to the amendment by striking out the two last words. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to add after his amendment these words: "And such of the West India Islands as are connected with the United States by telegraph;" so that we may get observations from those islands.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We get them now.

Mr. CONGER. I think not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; we get them from Cuba and all the West India Islands. They have their own systems of storm signals now, and we send them our intelligence.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. There is now a storm-signal office at Wilmington, North Carolina. The difficulty about it is that it is twenty-five miles from the bar at the mouth of the river. If this were changed to Smith's Island, where it could command the entrance to Cape Fear River, and information were then telegraphed to Wilmington, the purpose which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] has in view might be sufficiently answered. There is no danger in running twenty-five miles down the river. The dangerous entrances are the places where the storm signals are needed. I think if the gentleman cannot have all he wants, it would answer his purpose to have the present storm signal moved to the mouth of the river and warning given to the vessels coming in.

Mr. WADDELL. I think the gentleman from Connecticut misunderstands the situation. There is a long stretch of coast from Cape Hatteras to the mouth of Cape Fear River which is without a signal station; and if the signal station at Wilmington were removed to the mouth of the river we would still be without telegraphic communication to the city. What I want is to have the signal stations along the coast to the mouth of the river with communication up to Wilmington, so that we could be in communication and know when wrecks occur. As I said before, under present circumstances wrecks could occur along the coast there and before we would get intimation of them there would be great destruction of life and property from the want of telegraphic or signal communication.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. WADDELL, there were—ayes 84, noes 20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 1092 insert the following:

To provide for such extension of the signal service of the Army as will permit such observations as may be necessary with a view to the public health to be taken at the different stations throughout the United States, to be expended under the discretion of the Secretary of War, $5,000.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say in support of that amendment that it embodies the provision of a bill adopted unanimously by the Military Committee. It proposes to appropriate the small sum of $5,000 to aid the signal service, more immediately with a view to the benefit of the public health. We all know what the benefits of this service have been to agriculture, and especially to commerce. The physicians of the country believe it may be made equally subservient to the purposes of public health, and this proposes that the sum of $5,000 be appropriated for that purpose. The physicians of the country have petitioned that an appropriation of this sort should be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not attempt to delay the committee from its manifest purpose to enlarge this branch of the service. But I want to use my privilege once more to warn them what will be the consequences. For the first time there has been introduced into this service the principle of sectional arrangements; that is, naming in the bill the sections of the country where the service is to be extended. The example has just been set, and now another amendment is proposed, and hereafter it will be a regular practice for each man to propose amendments for his own section. It will be a river and harbor bill over again, until the whole matter breaks down by its own weight. I do not believe anything can be done to save this service if we enter upon this practice. I hope this amendment will not be adopted, and I will ask in the House for a separate vote to reject the amendment just adopted.

Mr. HUNTON. Let me say so far as this charge in regard to breaking down the signal service is concerned that this has the express approbation of General Myer.

Mr. GARFIELD. That may be, but the enthusiasm of General Myer is perhaps the most dangerous element in the future prospects of this service.

Mr. HUNTON. I think General Myer knows more about it than the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am aware that he knows a great deal more about it than I do, but I do not think he sees the danger to the system as I do.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment appropriating $5,000 for a health service, which sum is quite inadequate. It is quite ridiculous and preposterous to attempt to attach a health service to the signal service. If he desires to attain that object he must establish a health bureau. How in the world are the ordinary signal-service sergeants to return health statistics and to make scientific reports? I do not care whether General Myer or any other man recommends it. It ought to be recommended by men who have some medical knowledge, which General Myer has not.

Mr. HUNTON. But the gentleman will recollect that I stated that the physicians of the country have petitioned for this very thing.

Mr. BROMBERG. How in the world are the sergeants who take the observations of the signal service to get together medical data which will be worth one iota that scientific men can rely on? Will they gather the rumors that they may hear?

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman will read the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on this subject he will find out.

Mr. BROMBERG. I know all about that, for I have read the report of the Military Committee. But the idea of accomplishing this service by an appropriation of $5,000 is perfectly preposterous. You must have an appropriation of at least from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, and then you must organize a health board in every town.

Mr. HUNTON. I submit as a part of my remarks the report of the Committee on Military Affairs upon this subject:

From the first successful operation of the signal service in making predictions of weather changes, medical men have suggested its more direct application to sanitary science. The present application, like others which have preceded it, is commended by several considerations bearing directly upon public health.

The influence of atmospheric forces upon the human body has been long recognized. But the great defect in all attempts to advance the public health, through applied meteorological science, has been the lack of statistical evidence of the precise influence of atmospheric conditions on the aggravation or mitigation of disease. The numerical methods of induction, as applied to sanitary reforms, require exceeding care. They must cover an extensive ground of research. And it is obvious that the collection of statistical data commensurate with the importance and variety of the subject is beyond the capability of any individual or local medical society or health board.. The collection and tabulation of such meteorological observations as are required by physicians and sanatarians for the elucidation of problems of public health, must precede any important sanitary reforms; and the existing meteorological bureau is unquestionably the best agency for securing such material.

The association of epidemics with peculiar aërial changes is established by evidence the force of which few would be likely to question. Thus, many diseases which scourge the different parts of the United States appear clearly under the control of temperature. Yellow fever is known to require a temperature of nearly 70° to enable it to assume the epidemic form, and to be arrested by the agency of frost or freezing. Cholera, dysentery, and diarrhea respond to a high thermometer, while other public maladies are affected by the sudden thermal depression. Mortuary statistics in those cities where the greatest exactness is maintained in the registration of births and deaths conclusively show extreme mortality among the aged and infirm whenever a spell of intense cold suddenly bursts upon a locality. The mortality in such cases approximates that of a cholera or small-pox epidemic. On the other hand, the death rate in July, especially among the infantile population of towns and cities, mounts up to truly frightful figures.

Local observations show that the rise and fall of the barometer has a potent influence in checking or facilitating the formation of impure and poisonous gases in the streets and sewers of towns and cities, while a calm and muggy atmosphere is the instrument for accumulating and transporting the deadly effluvia.

The rain-fall is also known to exercise an influential force on public health. Thus, in Philadelphia, in the summer of 1872, under the influence of the combined heat and drought of June and in the early part of July, the death rate rose with startling rapidity from two hundred and forty at the end of the second week in June to five hundred before the end of the first week in July, continuing near this high point till August; the copious rains of that month (though the heat was unabated) caused as rapid a decline, and the mortality became gratifyingly small.

Such and similar facts abundantly attest the importance of affording health boards and physicians generally authentic information which may enable them to forewarn and forearm communities against impending epidemics and dangerous diseases.

It appears that the Signal Office is capable of extension to meet the expressed want of medical and sanitary science. The utilization of its means and force to this end can be accomplished—

1. By correspondence with the sanitary authorities and medical societies of the country, and by furnishing them with a full tabulated data required for testing sanitary regulations now established, and for devising new and better regulations.

2. By forwarding, by telegraph, special health warnings of approaching violent atmospheric changes to metropolitan health officers and to the press. These would be of great utility also to private physicians in their practice and treatment of the sick. Numerous illustrations of this kind of service would suggest themselves, e. g., in notifying authorities of expected heavy snows, which blockade the city streets and avenues, and become fruitful of public discomfort and sickness; in forewarnings of severe and polar cold, which sometimes suddenly sweeps with deadly effect over large and unsuspecting communities; and, in general, in cautioning the public of meteoric phenomena affecting health in a more direct and more precise way than the present weather reports admit of.

3. The same end can be further subserved by causing observations to be taken on the electricity and ozone of the atmosphere. Ozone-bearing winds and the varying electrical conditions of the atmosphere are supposed to exercise a very decisive influence upon health; and if such phenomena were carefully and systematically observed upon an extensive scale, and compared with vital statistics, they would probably afford results of very great value.

4. By securing and publishing climatic means and data for different sections of the country, the medical climatology of the United States would be ascertained and made known. The remedial agencies of some local climates, the deleterious all character of others, the effect of altitude above sea level on consumption and phthisical diseases, as well as upon many of the most epidemical plagues, are matters of great moment to medical practitioners and sanatarians. And, by occupying geographical points selected with a view to such investigations, information of the highest value to the public might very easily be obtained.

Doubtless other lines of usefulness, in a way to benefit public health, would suggest themselves should the signal service be empowered to undertake the new work proposed for it. But enough has been said to show the practicability of granting the petition.

Your committee report the accompanying bill, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken on Mr. BROMBERG'S amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. HUNTON'S amendment; and on a division there were ayes 28, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For completing the construction, and for maintenance and use of military telegraph lines on the Indian and Mexican frontiers, and for the connection of military posts and stations, for the better protection of immigration and the frontier settlements from depredations, especially in the State of Texas, the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and the Indian Territory, $88,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the expenses of operating and keeping in repair the said telegraph lines out of any money received for dispatches sent over said lines; any balance remaining after the payment of such expenses to be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt; the money received in any one fiscal year to be used only in payment for the expenses of that year. And a full report of the receipts and expenditures in connection with the said telegraph lines shall be made quarterly to the Secretary of War through the Chief Signal Officer. And the Chief Signal Officer shall have the charge and control of said lines of telegraph in the construction, repair, and operation of the same. And so much of this appropriation as may be necessary, not to exceed $30,000 in all, shall be used in constructing a telegraph line from Fort Marcy to Fort Bayard, in New Mexico, and from Fort Bayard to Camp Grant, in Arizona: Provided, That no money hereby appropriated, or any unexpended balance of former appropriations for the erection of military telegraph lines, shall be expended upon any line that cannot be completed by such appropriations herein or already made.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word. I do not intend to oppose the appropriation, for these military telegraphs are an absolute indispensability to the border. I only wish that some of this $85,000 should be appropriated for the better protection of the Mexican frontier. The House may be aware that this matter of protecting the Mexican frontier was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs at the last session of Congress. The House is not, however, aware of the depredations committed on that frontier and the thorough disgust of the ranchmen on that border at the apathy of Congress and the Government for their protection. Why, sir, it was only within a few months that three raids were made across that border, and twenty thousand dollars of property were carried across, and a large amount of other property of all kinds. This Territory lies between the Nueces and the Rio Grande, and is one hundred and fifty miles in extent. These Mexican marauding greasers ride fifty miles inland, and our troopers cannot overtake them. They laugh at us there. The mayor of Matamoras, General Cortinas, himself a robber, in the employ of the Mexican government, has six ranches stocked with cattle robbed from our side of the Rio Grande.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if the mayor is in the employ of the Mexican government?

Mr. COX. He is a brigadier-general in the service of the Mexican government.

Mr. DUNNELL. Was he in the service of the Mexican government in these robberies?

Mr. COX. I suppose that if the Mexican government were approached diplomatically on the subject they would disavow these robberies.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not think the government of Mexico employs him in that capacity.

Mr. MCNULTA. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COX. I cannot yield just now. I want to call the attention of Congress and of the people to the fact that while we are providing a military telegraph we are not giving that protection which these people are entitled to as citizens engaged in business there. In ten years one man, a notorious robber, has stocked his ranche with our property, and there has been no reparation. We sent a commission down there awhile ago, and it reported foolishly a large amount of consequential damages. It was such a ridiculous report that apathy sprung up in regard to this business. But, irrespective of that commission and that report, we have the statement from members here from Texas and the Delegate from New Mexico that the border is at the mercy of these marauding Mexicans.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow us to get through with this bill.

Mr. COX. I call attention to this thing for one purpose; To-morrow I propose to present a joint resolution in the interest of the men on that border. I hope it will pass unanimously upon the remarks I have submitted. The joint resolution which I propose to submit is as follows:

Joint resolution to protect American citizens on the Mexican border.

Whereas it is the duty of the Government of the United States to protect its citizens in their lives, property, and peaceful pursuits against violence and rapacity; and whereas for years past the citizens of the United States living along the valley of the Rio Grande and territory adjacent thereto, have been subjected to oft-repeated incursions of armed bands of marauders from the republic of Mexico, who have by force taken from citizens of the United States their property, and by acts of invasion, robbery, and murder have put in peril the amity and peace of the two republics; and whereas, notwithstanding the action taken by the Government of the United States, these acts of invasion are becoming more frequent, bold, and formidable: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the President of the United States, if in his opinion the emergency requires it, be respectfully requested to take such measures, either by diplomacy or otherwise, as will assure the peace of said borders and secure permanent friendly relations and commerce between the two countries and maintain the dignity of the United States Government and the rights of the citizens.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I move to amend the pending paragraph by inserting after it the following:

That the President is hereby authorized to detail or appoint, as assistants to the Chief Signal Officer, eight officers who, while so serving, shall have rank and pay of captains mounted, and eight who shall have the rank and pay of first lieutenants mounted, and the enlisted men of the signal service shall receive pay and allowanecs at the rates formerly fixed for enlisted men of the Signal Corps of the Army of similar grades.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point of order that the proposed amendment is contrary to existing law.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I took the precaution to obtain the consent of the House to offer this amendment. The House unanimously gave that consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not know that. Of course the point of order will not hold.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I not only got that consent of the House, but I asked the gentleman from Ohio where I should offer it, and he told me to offer it at this point of the bill.

I offer the amendment for this reason: I need not argue now the advantage of this service. Three years ago it was regarded as an experiment, and it was conducted by details of officers and surgeons engaged in the old Army signal service. We have now almost forgotten what the old signal service was. The Chief of the Signal Service is now going on without any permanent establishment, by sufferance. This is the way it works: A young lieutenant is brought there and becomes well qualified in the business, which is of itself a profession. He is liable at any time to be returned to his company, perhaps in New Mexico, although he may prefer to be here on the signal service.

The object of this amendment is to make permanent that which the country evidently intends to be a permanent branch of the service. We have now thirteen men regularly at work in this service, trained in the business. My amendment, drawn carefully and upon consultation with the Signal Service Corps, adds but three to the list of officers. It makes sixteen instead of thirteen, which he now has. The difference in the expenditure will be $10,900 for the sixteen officers to be detailed and appointed, and to be considered as belonging to a permanent branch of the service. It is perfectly proper that these officers should be fairly paid and have a fair opportunity for advancement.

As to the enlisted men, it will not do to put an ignorant man at any of these stations. A large portion of the corporals and privates now on service in this corps are well-educated men. They must be such; otherwise their reports would be of no use to the Department or to the country. This amendment proposes to give them pay similar to that which is given in the Ordnance, Engineer, and other branches of the service, which requires such men, those who have had the advantage of a fair education. The rates of pay are similar to those formerly paid enlisted men of the Signal Corps. The standard for admission to the signal service is higher than for any other branch of the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment and ask for a vote.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. It is whether it will be in order for the committee now to rise, and by a two-thirds vote in the House dispense with all further debate on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only state that it would be in order for the committee now to rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have now been here since half past seven, two and a half hours, and we have still over twenty pages of this bill to pass, and the public printing in the Treasury Department to go back to. I beg gentlemen to be as chary of debate as possible. We must finish this bill to-night or it cannot become a law.

Mr. CESSNA. That is the reason I made the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I want to move an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I rise to oppose the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has opposed it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I propose to strike out all of the first part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] down to the portion relating to enlisted men. I am in favor of the latter clause of his amendment. The enlisted men should have increased pay, as provided; they render very important service, and should receive corresponding pay. But I am entirely opposed to that portion of the amendment which I have moved to strike out, and for this reason: I do not know whether it is the object of the amendment, but certainly the effect of that portion which I propose to strike out may be to increase the number of the regular Army officers to the extent of sixteen new officers under the authority contained in the provision to appoint. I wish to state to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and to the House, that under his amendment the President will have power to detail sixteen officers of the regular Army for the signal service, which will be an increase, there now being thirteen. The power is given not only to detail officers from the regular Army, but to appoint new officers; at least it may be so construed. I do not say that such is the purpose of the gentleman from Connecticut in offering the amendment, but it is the legitimate construction of the provision according to the established rules of construction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this being a fair construction of the amendment, as I understand it, it will involve an additional expense of $45,000 for pay and allowances to these new officers. I wish to say further that if the President exercises this power by appointing these men from the Army into the signal service, he will then have the power to appoint men from civil life to fill these places. That such appointments may not be made, I ask for the adoption of my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I do not wish to occupy any time in discussion; but it does seem to me that a proposition to increase the Army to the extent of sixteen officers ought to command some attention.

Mr. O'BRIEN. For the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to reply, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I renew the amendment for the purpose of making an explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to the withdrawal of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The withdrawal of the amendment is objected to; and debate having been had upon it, it cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. O'BRIEN'S amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The northern and northwestern lakes:

For continuation of the survey of northern and northwestern lakes, $75,000.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by striking out "75" and inserting "150," so as to make the appropriation for this purpose $150,000. I will not detain the House with any remarks. I understand that the Committee on Appropriations are in favor of this amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Seventy-five thousand dollars was the amount to which we cut down this appropriation last year, but we have found that it was cut down too much.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS OBJECTS.

For geographical surveys of the Territories west of the one hundredth meridian, $25,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. As we have increased the appropriations for the other surveys, I move to make this appropriation $60,000 instead of $25,000.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to amend by making the appropriation $90,000. The Committee on Military Affairs have had the subject under consideration. The amount expended upon this survey heretofore has been $115,000. The Committee on Appropriations in this bill propose to reduce it to $25,000. I am assured that a less sum than $90,000 will not be sufficient. I do not wish to detain the committee or I might refer to the report of the Committee on Appropriations upon this subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to say a single word. Last year the Committee on Public Lands gave a very full hearing to all these matters of surveys, and adjusted by a report which they submitted to the House the relative proportions of these surveys. The Committee on Appropriations this year undertook to cut them down to a considerably lower grade. But we afterward became satisfied that we had cut too deeply. Hence the appropriation for the Hayden expedition was put up to $75,000; and we propose to put this one up to $60,000. As the latter expedition has besides the appropriation the use of as many officers and soldiers of the Army as it may be necessary to employ, as well as animals, rations, and general supplies, which the other expedition does not have, an appropriation of $60,000 puts this on a full equality with the other, and keeps up the balance of the arrangement of last year in this respect, I hope we shall not make the sum any larger.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to make a single statement. The report of the Committee on the Public Lands at the last session could not have furnished any data as to the relative amount to be appropriated for these surveys. That report had no such object in view, and I am satisfied it justifies no such inference.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There are eighty-six men employed in this survey, only six of whom are officers. I am satisfied that there is no more important survey or exploration than this. The only reason why it has not become popularized as Hayden's survey has is that the reports have not been printed by order of Congress and members have not seen them. If this work is to be done at all it should be done well. I am satisfied that the amount proposed in my amendment ought to be appropriated. The Hayden exploration gets $80,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; it does not.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Well, the Department of the Interior gets $80,000 for these explorations, and you ought to give the War Department at least $70,000.

The amendment of Mr. ALBRIGHT was not agreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For engraving and printing the plates and atlas-sheets accompanying the reports of the geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, $20,000.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move the following amendment:

In line 1129, page 47, after the word "for" insert the word "preparing," so that the line will read "for preparing, engraving, and printing the plates and atlas-sheets."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I move at the end of line 1132 to add the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

For head-boards and head-stones at the soldiers' graves in Woodlawn cemetery at Elmira, New York, and for the care of said graves, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and all that part of Woodlawn cemetery lying north of Sycamore avenue, upon filing in the War Department the consent of the common council of the city or Elmira, is hereby declared a national cemetery, and the headboards at the graves of confederate prisoners shall be renewed as they decay, and the expense thereof shall be defrayed from the annual appropriation for national cemetries.

Mr. FIELD. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules were suspended making the amendment in order to this appropriation bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOWNDES. I move the following amendment:

For paying to Judge Daniel Weisel, of Hagerstown, Maryland, his account on file in the Treasury Department, for income tax illegally collected on his judicial salaries during the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, and 1867, $413.84.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ARCHER. The Committee on Appropriations agreed that amendment should come in.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 37.

Mr. LOWNDES demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. HALE of Maine, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informing the House that that body had concurred in the resolution of the House correcting the clerical error in the report of the conference committee on House bill No. 2093, by transferring the first amendment proposed to section 2, from and after the words "wounds received in action," in the fourteenth line, so it will come after the words "wounds received in battle," in the eighteenth line.

It further informed the House that the Senate had passed a resolution that ten thousand copies of the addresses delivered in the two Houses on the occasion of the announcement of the death of Hon. William A. Buckingham, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut, be printed, five thousand each for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives; in which the concurrence of the House was asked.

It further announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. STEVENSON as managers of said conference on its part.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. STEVENSON as managers of said conference on its part.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary, who informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 135) appointing managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers;

An act (H. R. No. 1938) to provide for settlements with certain railway companies;

An act (H. R. No. 3700) granting a pension to Teter Wolfgong;

An act (H. R. No. 3708) granting a pension to Eunice Wilson, mother of John C. Wilson, late private Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 3717) granting a pension to Sarah McAdams; and

An act (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 1132 the following:

To pay John M. Burns, contestee, expenses in contested-election case of Burns vs. Young, tenth district of Kentucky, $2,164.65.

To pay Andrew Sloan, contestant, expenses, case of Sloan vs. Rawls, first district of Georgia, $2,922.10.

To pay Benjamin F. Martin, contestant, expenses, case of Martin vs. Hagans, second district of West Virginia, $981.85.

To pay John J. Davis, contestee, expenses, case of Wilson vs. Davis, first district of West Virginia, $1,760.50.

To pay Benjamin Wilson, contestant, expenses, case of Wilson vs. Davis, first district of West Virginia, $1,015.91.

To pay J. M. Hagans, contestee, expenses, case of Martin vs. Hagans, second district of West Virginia, $900.

To pay M. L. Bell, contestant, expenses, case of Bell vs. Snyder, second district of Arkansas, $3,000.

To pay O. P. Snyder, contestee, expenses, case of Bell vs. Snyder, second district of Arkansas, $3,000.

To pay Thomas M. Gunter, contestant, expenses, case of Gunter vs. Wilshire, third district of Arkansas, $3,000.

To pay John D. Young, contestee, expenses, case of Burns vs. Young, tenth district of Kentucky, $1,582.

To pay L. C. Gause, contestant, expenses, case of Gause vs. Hodges, first district of Arkansas, $3,000.

To pay Asa Hodges, contestee, expenses, case of Gause vs. Hodges, first district of Arkansas, $3,000.

To pay C. Y. Thomas, contestant, expenses, case of Thomas vs. Davis, fifth district of Virginia, $773.17.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to say a single word in support of the amendment. The Committee on Elections has adopted the rule in making these recommendations to recommend the payment of the expenses in no case except where the committee was unanimous.

Mr. SPEER. I want to raise a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The rule was suspended to enable the chairman of the Committee on Elections to offer the amendment.

Mr. SPEER. I am aware of that. But my point of order is that it is not in order to put on an omnibus amendment of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules were suspended for the purpose of allowing this very amendment to be offered.

Mr. SPEER. But not for the purpose of including a dozen men here in one resolution. As I understand it, the rules were suspended to make it in order to offer amendments to pay certain contestants and contestees.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I was saying that the committee went upon the principle of making no recommendation except where the committee was unanimously of opinion that the contest was instituted in good faith and for probable cause, and I submit that the House can adhere to the rule which the committee has adopted with perfect safety.

There seems to be, Mr. Chairman, a misapprehension as to the amendment of the law in the last Congress. There was no provision of law that these expenses should not be paid under any circumstances. But in an appropriation bill a clause was inserted that these expenses should not be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. There were very good reasons for this. The law prescribes that the contingent fund of the House should only be used to pay the ordinary expenses of the House, whereas the expenses of the contestant and contestee were not among the ordinary expenses of the House. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only to say that it has been the traditional policy of the Government for nearly a hundred years to pay the expenses of the parties coming here in good faith and with probable cause to contest for seats in this House. It was only in the last Congress that the provision was adopted that these expenses should not be paid out of the contingent fund, and this amendment or provision was adopted without debate. The debates in the Congressional Globe will show that this question has been up for consideration over and over and over again. And the leaders of the House and the ablest statesmen of the House have thought public policy demanded that we should encourage contests, not discourage them, where instituted upon probable cause in the interest of the purity of the ballot-box and the purity of this House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire simply to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from New York. After the very deliberate opinion expressed by the Committee on Elections of some four years ago, I think when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] was chairman of that committee, that it was found to be a very vicious practice to pay contestants the expenses of their contests and that contests were gotten up more for the sake of the pay than for anything else, and a very large number of contests was thrown upon the House, overburdening our Calendar with work and our contingent fund with drafts—to meet all that it was then declared and made a part of the law as the deliberate judgment of that Congress that contestants should not be paid. Of course if a contestant gets his seat then he gets his pay as a member of Congress. Now, here is an amendment which puts in a group all the men, I believe, that have been unsuccessful contestants in this Congress.

Mr. LAMAR. You are mistaken.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. It includes thirteen out of thirty-four.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment includes a very large number. We are asked to put on thirteen men without discrimination, without stating which man has a clear case and which has a less clear. We are asked to put all in a lump and appropriate for them, and thus substantially and virtually break down the law which has been established so deliberately on that subject, changing the policy of four years and opening again the whole subject.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to my colleague for a question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me ask the chairman of the Committee on Elections if there are not some names on the list which has just been read of members who were not only contestants but who are now members of this House and receiving their full pay?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the gentleman will find upon the list the names of men who were contestants and who are also members of the House and have been receiving pay for the whole time. Now, for instance, a gentleman according to the report of the Committee on Elections is to be between now and the day after to-morrow seated. He has been a contestant up to this time, and is he to be paid as a contestant and also as a member? Is he to be paid $10,000 upon the last day of the term during which he has never served but one day? That may be the case if this principle is carried out, as I hope it will not be.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say that there are some cases of contestants, and perhaps of contestees, who should be paid, at least in my judgment; but to put them together in an omnibus amendment to this bill and force the House to vote to pay all these men or against paying them all is unfair to the men who should be paid and unfair to the House as to the men who should not be paid.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I have no objection to a separate vote being taken.

Mr. SPEER. I cannot be interrupted now. Take the case of the Delegate from Utah, [Mr. CANNON,] who is not embraced in this amendment. His seat was contested. He received 18,000 votes out of 20,000, and yet he was put to the expense of taking testimony and securing counsel, and the Committee on Elections did not put his name on this list, although of all the contests before the House his was the most fraudulent and groundless. I find upon this list the name of Mr. HODGES, of Arkansas, whose right to his seat has not yet been determined by the House. There is a majority report of the committee in his favor and a minority report against him, but the House has not yet determined that he is entitled to his seat; and yet we are asked to pay him, in addition to his compensation as a member and his mileage, the sum of $3,000 for the contest. I only cite this case to show that it is manifestly unjust that men who are entitled to be paid should be weighed down by carrying the burden of other men who have no merit in their cases and should not receive one dollar. It is unfair to the House to compel us to vote against men who have merit in their claim in order to strike at men who have not. But I would rather stand by the law of the last Congress; I would rather do wrong to individuals and trust to the future to remedy it than do wrong to my conscience and to the people by giving additional compensation to men who never had any just claim and who have prosecuted or resisted contests from the most fraudulent and frivolous considerations. Let each case stand on its own merits and be fully considered, and not be rushed through at this hour of the night and of the session.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCCRARY. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am very reluctant to antagonize the Committee on Elections, and I should not do so were it not for the fact that during the whole of last Congress I struggled to incorporate into law a provision against the paying of contestants in these cases their expenses. It is true that that provision of the statute only goes to the extent of prohibiting the payment by the House out of its contingent fund of these expenses. It went to that extent only because it would have been useless to have gone further. As a matter of course, it is in the power of Congress at any time by joint action of the two Houses to appropriate money for this or any other purpose, and therefore a provision that no contestant should be paid by an appropriation by Congress would have been entirely nugatory so far as controlling any future Congress is concerned.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] says that the provision to which I have referred was adopted without debate. It is true that at the time it was actually incorporated into an appropriation bill there was no debate; but there had been frequent debate during the last Congress, in which this whole subject was thoroughly discussed by a number of gentlemen on the floor; and if gentlemen will take the pains to examine the debates, they will find in those debates a statement prepared by the Clerk of the House, showing the sums of money that had been paid as expenses in these contested-election cases, amounting in the Forty-second Congress to considerably more than $100,000, and in the Forty-third Congress to the same amount. It had become an abuse. The Committee on Elections in the last Congress were satisfied that in a great many instances contests had been instituted more for the purpose of making money than for any other reason.

I know very well the rule of the House was then precisely what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] says it ought to be now; to pay only those who had probable cause of contest. But it is very difficult to discriminate between the man who has probable cause and the man who has not. The result will be that in every case, with perhaps a very few exceptions, the contestant will obtain his expenses. If he is paid when he fails to establish his right, of course you will pay the sitting member who succeeds in establishing his right.

I do not believe it is necessary in order to encourage men to assert their rights to a seat in this House, that this promise of reward should be held out to them. If a man has an honest case, if he believes he has a right to a seat in the Congress of the United States, he will assert his right and take his chances of making good his claim. In case he succeeds he receives his pay from the commencement of the Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. How much did your Committee on Elections allow during the last Congress?

Mr. MCCRARY. The committee of which I was chairman allowed a large sum, according to the rules established by preceding Congresses. But we abolished the practice of paying contestants, as far as we could possibly do so.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of saying that instead of embarrassing or limiting the contesting of elections we ought rather to facilitate it. It is the great means of keeping the ballot-box pure, of protecting the elective franchise. If you lay down the rule here for all time to come that every man who contests a seat does so at his own cost, you will find a great many men in the country who will be unable out of their own pockets to pay even $1,000, to say nothing of $3,000, to carry on a contest for a seat here. There will then be simply a scramble of unscrupulous officers to get a certificate and seat the man that holds it, knowing that that will practically settle the case, and that no one can contest successfully without money to do so.

If we have a Committee on Elections that is worthy the name, that has any title or claim to that high position in the House, after they have heard the investigation they can tell whether the contest was made honestly and in good faith, or whether it was a mere colorable pretext for the purpose of making money. While I have been here I have known I know not how many instances of the committee reporting that the contestant should not be paid, and he was not paid, and many have not been paid to this day.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The Committee on Elections has reported in favor of only thirteen contestants out of thirty-four. There are perhaps two others that the committee will act upon hereafter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should be very sorry indeed to see a rule established here to operate for all future time in all future election cases, to the effect that whoever contested a seat in the House should do so at his own personal cost. It would simply be a premium on fraud and dishonesty and all manner of unlawful practices. On the other hand, we ought to invite contests as being the highest and best security of the ballot-box.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask to have read the order of the House which makes this amendment in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be so far suspended that it may be in order at the time the sundry civil appropriation bill or the deficiency appropriation bill is under consideration in Committee of the Whole to move an amendment thereto to pay the expenditures in whole or part of such parties to contested-election cases in the Forty-third Congress as the Committee on Elections may recommend.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the six last words in order to bring to the attention of the committee a view of this matter which has struck me as one worthy of their consideration. If the House shuts down entirely upon paying the expenses of a man who contests a seat, then we will add one more to the things which have a tendeney to bring only rich men into Congress. Rich men can contest seats, but poor men cannot. The poor deserving man who is the choice of his fellow-citizens, and it may be of the poorer class of his fellow-citizens, who has been cheated by the rivalry and corrupt practices of the rich man, will not be able to get the seat that belongs to him because he cannot pay the expenses. He cannot get the money as he can do now, for he can now say to his friends "Raise the money for me, and I shall have it reimbursed to me by the House, for I have an honest case." Elections to the other branch of Congress have now become nothing more than the results of representative caucuses. Here are the Representatives of the people, and anything that keeps the ballot-box free, that puts the poor man on an equal footing with the rich so far as his rights are concerned, that takes away the advantage which the rich man has in matters of election, ought to be cherished in this House. However much the expense may be, no sum in my judgment can be better expended.

I call the attention of this side of the House to the fact that hereafter we may be contestants much more often than we have been. We are setting an example to the other side of the House which when they come into power I hope they will not follow. I say again it seems to me that true democratic republicanism requires us to see to it that the poorest man, if he has a good case to bring before the House, shall be sure to have an opportunity to present that case.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman believe that his side of the House has done that during the last twelve years?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman mean to say that his side of the House has decided election cases upon their merits?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; I never saw an election contest decided on its merits anywhere.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe you will see that in the next House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have observed that the democratic minority here always vote for the democratic applicant for a seat, while the republicans, being in the majority, generally vote for the republican applicant, except a few men who claim to be more cautious or more virtuous than the rest. I think generally the vote in such cases has been according to party predilections.

Mr. SPEER. I want to state to the committee just how this matter stands so far as the case of Mr. HODGES, of Arkansas, is concerned. He has drawn $12,082 pay and about $1,000 for mileage and stationery, making $13,000. This amendment proposes to give him $3,000 more, making $16,000, though the House has never yet voted that he is entitled to the seat.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. There has been a report of the Committee on Elections that he is entitled to the seat.

Mr. SPEER. Yes, and a report that he is not entitled.

The amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HYNES. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Provided, That no sitting member who shall be unseated before the expiration of Congress shall be entitled to the benefit of this appropriation.

I offer this proviso to meet the objection which has been raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I will not object to that.

Mr. HYNES. I wish to say in general as regards the contest from the State of Arkansas that so meritorious were those contests that two months passed by before the Committee on Elections could determine who were entitled to seats upon the prima facie of cases. The question was left so undetermined by the governor with the certificate of election so issued that each man felt that he had a meritorious case of contest. Under such a state of circumstance, it seems to me it would be extremely unjust on the part of the House to refuse to adopt the proposition.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HYNES] as a modification of my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SMITH, of New York, as modified, there were—ayes 45, noes 55; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMITH, of New York, and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 90, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. I give notice that I shall call the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new paragraph after the amendment just adopted:

That so much of section 38 of the Revised Statutes as requires the Clerk of the House of Representatives to omit from the pay-roll of Representatives and Delegates elected to Congress those holders of proper certificates whose election he may be notified will be contested, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I desire to say that this provision has been unanimously approved by the Committee on the Judiciary; and it would have passed the House yesterday but for the objection of the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Massachusetts, both of whom have since withdrawn their objection.

Mr. SPEER. I suggest a modification of the amendment by striking out "proper" and inserting the word "legal" before the word "certificates."

Mr. CESSNA. I have no objection to that modification.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIAM. I offer the following amendment:

Insert at the end of section 5 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress, establishing the court of the commissioners of Alabama claims, the following:

Provided, That the aggregate sum paid to said counsellor at law shall not exceed $10,000 per annum.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make a point of order on that.

Mr. MERRIAM. The rules have been suspended to make it in order. I ask the Clerk to read the section which it is proposed to correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, let it go.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collection and payment of bounty, prize-money, and other claims of colored soldiers and sailors; salaries of agents and clerks; rent of office; fuel, lights, stationery, and similar necessaries; office furniture and repairs; mileage and transportation of officers and agents; telegraphing and postage, $75,000.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to amend by striking out this paragraph. I make this amendment for the purpose of inquiring how much longer these appropriations of $75,000 and $85,000 are to be made for paying bounties, &c., to colored soldiers. I would also like to know whether any portion of this appropriation is to refund money misused by the managers of the Freedman's Bank, who had charge of this matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know anything about the mismanagement of the Freedman's Bank. I know that this appropriation is necessary under the law. There are thirty-three clerks and nine messengers employed in doing this work, which is not yet finished. This is the amount which the committee deemed necessary to carry on the work.

Mr. BROMBERG. Does not the gentleman know that this has been done by the Freedman's Bank?

Mr. GARFIELD. I know it was done by the Freedman's Bureau, but not by the Freedman's Bank.

Mr. BROMBERG. It was done by the Freedman's Savings-Bank, and I wish to know what has become of the machinery you are now appropriating for.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the publication of the official records of the war of the rebellion, both of the Union and of the confederate armies, $50,000; which shall be available from and after the passage of this act; and where extra services are performed after office hours and in addition to other regular duties by the clerks employed upon this work, they shall be paid such reasonable extra compensation therefor as the Secretary of War may determine.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to insert the word "continuing;" so it will read: "For continuing the publication of the official records of the war of the rebellion," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does this include the proceedings of the so-called confederate congress?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose not. There was a law made last session for publishing the official records of the Army during the late war, including the military records obtained as part of the proceedings of the war, by capture and otherwise, at the close of the rebellion.

Mr. MAYNARD. The reason I ask the question is this——

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a letter on page 28 of the report of the Committee on Appropriations on this bill setting forth the condition of this work which I ask to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 13, 1875.

DEAR SIR: In the sundry civil appropriation bill, approved June 23, 1874, $15,000 were appropriated to enable the Secretary of War to begin the publication of the records of the war of the rebellion—Union and confederate—and he was directed to have copied for the Public Printer all reports, letters, telegrams, and general orders not heretofore copied or printed, and arranged in chronological order.

In his annual estimates for 1875–'76 the Secretary of War asks for $15,000 to continue the work, and in his annual report for 1874 expresses the conviction that the appropriation should be larger than this estimate. Owing to the important and confidential character of the records to be examined, the magnitude of the work, and the value of the documents from which the record will be prepared, the Secretary has been compelled to assign to the duty of preparing them for publication clerks of tried experience, and in whom he has confidence, in order that not only the work may be well done, but that the records may be carefully preserved. In his report the Secretary says that the clerks "to whom the work has been assigned have been chosen on account of their comprehensive knowledge of the records and the events of the war."

While some additional force has been employed to copy some of the records, the greater part of the work is being done by gentlemen who are already in the Department, and who, while they receive only the small compensation of clerks of their grade, have all the responsibility of the work, and none of the men so employed can be given extra compensation on account of existing statutes to the effect that no Government employé can receive any compensation but his regular salary for any public services whatever. The hardship is illustrated by the following case in point: The telegrams of the War Department are embraced in a series of several hundred volumes, which contain material most valuable and confidential—important both to the Government and individuals—with a mass of telegrams uninteresting and trifling in their character. But one or two persons in the Department have any intimate acquaintance with these particular records, and access to them is only allowed to those officials in the Department who have the full confidence of the Secretary of War. Under these circumstances it would be highly impolitic to assign the work of preparing them for publication to inexperienced persons or to any of whose integrity and ability the Secretary of War has not had proof. He has therefore assigned to the duty a gentleman of his own immediate office, but who is engaged during office hours in his ordinary duties, and is compelled therefore to assort, copy, and arrange the telegrams long after the customary hours for closing the Department. This work is performed in addition to the duties required of him during office hours, and he cannot receive pay for this extra duty on account of the prohibitions of law, nor, for reasons above stated, would it be advisable to place the work in the hands of those who could devote their official time to its accomplishment.

This is an illustrative case, but it applies equally to other individuals. It was for these reasons that the Secretary in his report recommended that when an appropriation for this work is made authority be given to pay them for such extra services in addition to their salary as clerks.

If this recommendation is approved, a proviso could be added to the clause making the appropriation, leaving it to the sound discretion of the Secretary of War to make payments for extra service on this work.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. T. CROSBY,
Chief Clerk.

Approved:

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
House of Representatives.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will be seen he asks for a considerably larger sum than we have given him. The Secretary of War asked for $100,000 and we only give him $50,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. The reason why I asked the question I did is this: A gentleman formerly a member of this House, and an acquaintance of mine, who was a member of the confederate congress, told me the proceedings of the confederate congress were important as a part of the history of the war, and ought to be preserved and published. I move to insert, therefore, that this shall include the publication of the official records of the confederate congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his amendment. That will come in as a separate work.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of costs and charges of State penitentiaries for the care, clothing, maintenance, and medical attendance of United States military convicts confined in them, $40,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment from the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by act of June 10, 1872, to provide for the erection of head-stones upon the graves of soldiers in national cemeteries, is hereby continued and rendered available for its original purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I presume there will be no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POTTER. I send up the following, which will come in as a pertinent amendment at this place.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and is hereby, appropriated to pay the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the President, under a joint resolution approved February 16, 1875, to attend the international penitentiary congress to be held next year at Rome.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is all right.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I offer the following as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 25 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing the time for holding elections of Representatives to Congress, is hereby modified so as not to apply to any State which has not changed its day of election and whose constitution must be amended in order to effect a change in the day of election of said officers in said State.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I should like to know whether that is in order to this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The rules were suspended to make it in order.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has had the rules suspended and this made in order by a very large vote in the House, and I have offered it, as he is not able to be here. As the House has already passed upon it by a large vote, I will not take time to debate it at length.

Mr. POTTER. This is to make the Maine election in August instead of November, as it ought to be.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that it be added to the end of the bill as an additional section.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is indispensable to the success of this session to get this bill through in order to send it to the Senate by the time of meeting to-morrow. So I hope members will stay here to pass it.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing for one to stay until twelve o'clock. In all human probability we will be here late to-morrow night, and the next night we will be here all night.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish gentlemen to remember that the Senate must have a good deal of time to consider this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the Senate have the tax bill still to consider?

Mr. GARFIELD. They have finished it, and they are now without business until we send them this.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will adopt some method to stop this continuous talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will make a single suggestion. The Chair will be able to entertain all the motions and to put them through very rapidly if gentlemen will not insist on such interminable talk.

Mr. RANDALL. I think what the Chair says is very true, but he says it from the wrong place. That ought to be said from the floor.

Mr. COBURN. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as an additional paragraph:

That the sum of $600 be appropriated to compensate Messrs. Bryant and Rogers, architects, for plans and specifications for a military prison prepared and forwarded to the United States commissioners on said prison at their request, to enable them to complete a report ordered by the War Department, in reference to the construction and cost of said military prison.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in enrolling, equipping, and transporting troops for the defense of the United States during the late insurrection, $250,000.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1154, after the words "late insurrection," add the following:

And for arms and munitions of war taken for said purposes by the United States from any State not in insurrection.

Mr. GUNCKEL. That language will cover the State of Maryland. The claim has been investigated by the Committee on Military Affairs, and is a just one. This amendment does not appropriate more money. It does not say the claim shall be allowed, but simply provides that if at any time it is established to be a proper claim and is allowed it shall be paid.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I must make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. ARCHER. The gentleman from Maine is willing to waive the point of order if a limitation be put in that the amendment shall only apply to the State of Maryland.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I agree to modify the amendment in that way.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not insist on the point of order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr GUNCKEL, as modified, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

To provide for the payment, under existing laws, for horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States, $50,000. And the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849, is hereby repealed.

Mr. LOWE. I make the point of order on the last four lines of that paragraph that it repeals existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as an additional section the following:

To alter three stone buildings to fit them for the purpose of a military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, and to build a suitable wall around the buildings, $100,000: Provided, That the amount herein appropriated shall be so expended as to complete the work.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE, (the Speaker.) I desire to offer an amendment to this bill, if I can get the attention of the committee, which would be liable to the point of order. It is new legislation, and I offer it in the interest of those who may hereafter be officers of the House of Representatives. I am about at the end of my own official connection with the House, and I have in my own person suffered the inconvenience which this section, if adopted, will remedy. It is intended to protect officers who are sued for acts, official acts done by order of the House. I was myself sued for the modest sum of $100,000 for issuing a warrant to put a recusant witness in jail, and it cost a considerable sum of money to defend that suit. The House of course very generously came to the rescue. But I think that officers of the House, acting under orders of the House, ought to be placed on the same basis as that on which the law now places revenue officers. I therefore ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment which has been very carefully drawn by the attorney who has had charge of the suit of Joseph B. Stewart against myself and the Sergeant-at-Arms. It has not been offered on account of any relation to this case. I offer it now because I am entirely out of the wood for the benefit of future officers. If it had any relation to myself I would not have introduced it.

Mr. GARFIELD. You are only out of the wood if the deficiency bill passes.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. The House agreed to assume it. If the appropriation is not made now it will be hereafter. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in any action now pending or which may be brought against any officer for or on account of anything done by him while an officer of either House of Congress, while in the discharge of his official duty in executing any order of such House, the district attorney for the district within which the action is brought, on being thereto requested by the officer sued, shall enter an appearance in behalf of such officer; and all provisions of the eighth section of the act of July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue and for other purposes," and also all provisions of the sections of former acts therein referred to, so far as the same relate to the removal of suits, to withholding of executions, and the payment of judgments against revenue or other officers of the United States, shall become applicable to such action and to all proceedings and matters whatsoever connected therewith; and the defense of such action shall thenceforth be conducted under the supervision and direction of the Attorney-General.

Mr. NIBLACK. Should that not come in as an additional section of the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. It will be so entered.

Mr. COX. I have only to say to the distinguished gentleman from Maine that it is generally supposed on this side of the House that this amendment is offered for the benefit of candidates for the Speakership of the next Congress; and I wish to say that we all thank him very kindly for taking care of us.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing work on the east wing of the building for the State, War, and Navy Departments, $700,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment to come in at the beginning of that paragraph:

For completing the south wing of the State, War, and Navy Departments, under the direction of the Secretary of State, $60,000.

The object of that amendment is that there remains that much needed to close up the south wing, which is under the direction of the Secretary of State, and this amount will cover the remaining expense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

And the Congressional Printer is hereby authorized to print and bind five thousand additional copies of the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion; and the Sugeon-General is hereby authorized to continue on duty in his office the acting assistant surgeons now employed on said history until the end of the next fiscal year.

Mr. DONNAN. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of line 1230:

One thousand of which shall be for the use of the Senate, three thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, and one thousand for distribution by the Surgeon-General of the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is assented to by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I offer the following amendment to come in at the close of the paragraph last read:

The Congressional Printer is further hereby authorized and directed to print and bind two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874, for distribution by Senators and Representatives and Delegates of the present Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. FORT. What is the point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. That this appropriation is not authorized by law. The resolution passed the House but not the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the point of order is well taken.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For the construction of a pedestal for an equestrian statue, to be furnished by the association hereinafter named, of Major-General James B. McPherson, who was killed at the battle of Atlanta, $25,000: Provided, That the design of said pedestal shall be approved by the Secretary of War, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, and the corresponding secretary of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, or a majority of them: And provided also, That it shall be erected in Scott Square, in the city of Washington, on or near its center, the ground of which shall be adapted to such erection by the discontinuance of the carriage-way connecting Vermont avenue, now running through said square; and said square shall hereafter be known as McPherson Square.

Mr. FORT. I move to strike out the last two lines. I have no objection to naming a square after General McPherson, but this square is already named after General Scott; and I see no reason for making a change.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is another place named after General Scott, where his statue is.

Mr. O'NEILL. I suggest that we had better put some of these statues east of the Capitol, on the government reservations there.

Mr. HALE of Maine. Let me explain this matter. Scott Square was originally intended as the place where the statue of General Scott should be placed, but the plan was changed and it was placed on what is now known as Scott Circle, and therefore the name of this square should be changed to some other. It is therefore deemed proper that this statue of General McPherson, which we get for nothing, should be placed there and the name changed.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BANNING. I move to strike out the proviso, so as to let the association erect a monument wherever they see fit.

The Clerk read the proviso as follows:

And provided also, That it shall be erected in Scott Square, in the city of Washington, on or near its center, the ground of which shall be adapted to such erection by the discontinuance of the carriage-way connecting Vermont avenue, now running through said square; and said square shall hereafter be known as McPherson Square.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the word "erected," on line 1242:

On the public grounds east of the Capitol, and in such place as may be selected by the Secretary of War.

I merely offer the amendment with a view to having some statuary put on the grounds east of the Capitol.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Does not the gentleman know that we have a beautiful statue of Washington east of the Capitol now?

Mr. O'NEILL. Well, then, let us have a beautiful statue of McPherson there also.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the following to come in as an additional paragraph:

To enable the Secretary of War to acquire a full and perfect title to the Brady collection of photographs of the war, and to secure and purchase the remainder now in the possession of the artist, $25,000.

I only wish to say that a portion of this collection now belongs to the War Department and a portion is in the hands of the artist. We desire to get a title to the whole, it being a collection of all the scenes of the war and of the prominent men who had connection with the war. Now is the time to secure it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move the following as an additional paragraph:

That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the construction of public roads within the limits of Yellowstone Park, the survey of its boundaries, and for such other purposes as may be deemed necessary, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, to accomplish the ends contemplated by this act and that of March 1, 1872; said appropriation to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the sum hereby appropriated shall first be expended in surveying, establishing, and marking the boundaries of said park, and the residue, if any, used as hereinbefore provided.

The Secretary of the Interior recommended the sum of $75,000 for this purpose. The Senate reported a bill appropriating $25,000 for the purpose, and the Committee on Public Lands of the House recommend that reduced sum. This is needed for the purpose of preserving this park. There is very great need that the boundaries of this Yellowstone Park, this most wonderful section of the country, shall now be ascertained. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment. I think it is too early for this appropriation, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I raise the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, even if good, comes too late, for two speeches, one for and one against the amendment, have been made. But the Chair would rule that the point of order is not well taken.

The amendment of Mr. DUNNELL was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For completing the improvement of reservation between Third and Sixth streets, as per plan, $10,000.

For filling and grading reservation on Maryland avenue lately occupied by the Agricultural Department, $8,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I presume these two paragraphs relate to the same piece of ground. And in the second paragraph it should read "Missouri avenue" and not "Maryland avenue." The first paragraph relates to what was known as the "tea garden," I suppose.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman, I think, is mistaken. The "reservation between Third and Sixth streets" is one thing, and the "reservation on Maryland avenue" is another thing.

Mr. RANDALL. It is on Missouri avenue.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think it touches Maryland avenue.

Mr. RANDALL. I am sure it does not touch Maryland avenue.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It may be that I am mistaken; I put it in here as it was given to me.

Mr. RANDALL. I will not detain the committee now, but I hope I may have the privilege of correcting it hereafter if I find it to be necessary.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Very well.

The Clerk read the following:

For improving various reservations, $3,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out that paragraph. We have been appropriating in detail for these reservations, and this is a sort of sop for general distribution. I do not think it is required.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will tell why we do this. We appropriate in detail for the larger squares. But there are in addition some sixty-odd small reservations, a list of which I have in my hand, and instead of appropriating in detail for those sixty or more little squares fifty or sixty dollars each, we put it in a lump. It does not go to the reservations that are provided for specifically.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For removal of the present iron fence inclosing Lafayette Square, and substituting post and chain, $5,000; and the fences on the eastern and western sides of the Agricultural grounds shall be taken down and removed during the present fiscal year.

Mr. FORT. I move to strike out this paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. The fence is worth more than the post and chain. We have just put a fence there, and now you propose to take it away and put up a post and chain.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection to striking out the part which relates to the fence around Lafayette Square, if gentlemen think proper to do so. But let me call attention to the portion of the paragraph relating to the Agricultural grounds. The fence which has for so long been along the sides of the Smithsonian grounds, which will be a part of the great park by and by, is to be taken down, so that the drives can be carried through there. And the side fences along the Agricultural grounds should also be taken down. It will do no harm to take them down; no one objects to that. But let the fence remain around Lafayette Square.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Are the fences along the Agricultural grounds of iron or of wood?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mostly an old wooden fence.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think I can cure the whole difficulty by amending the paragraph so that it will read:

The fences on the eastern and western sides of the Agricultural grounds shall be taken down and removed during the present fiscal year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. No appropriation is needed for that.

Mr. GARFIELD. We must put something in; say $100.

Mr. FORT. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For new chandeliers for the corridors and passages of the House of Representatives to correspond with those in the Senate, $5,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the clause just read.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Commissioner of Public Buildings came twice before our committee to say that some of the chandeliers about the Capitol were worn out and really in such a condition that the escape of gas was likely to cause serious injury. He asked us particularly to save this clause.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Washington Aqueduct: For engineering, maintenance, and general repairs, $15,000; for building an iron truss-roof and for furnishing and setting galvanized-iron cornice on the gate-house at Great Falls, $3,000; for building dwelling and office for gate-keeper at the receiving reservoir, $3,000; for continuing, widening, and macadamizing roadway between the distributing reservoir and the Great Falls, $5,000: Provided, That the lands belonging to the United States and lying around the receiving reservoir shall hereafter be controlled in connection with the Washington Aqueduct, and shall be under the charge and control of the officer in charge of said aqueduct: And provided further, That the chief engineer is hereby directed to notify the Washington and Georgetown Railway Company to remove their railway-track from the Washington-Aqueduct bridge over Rock Creek, within one year from the date of said notice; and said company shall make such removal within the year aforesaid; and said chief engineer may establish and publish regulations prohibiting the passage of heavily loaded wagons and carriages over said bridge.

Mr. NIBLACK. I make a point of order on the proviso attached to this paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. The rules were suspended to make this in order. I move to amend the paragraph by inserting after the word "aforesaid," in line 1360, the following:

And have the right to lay their tracks along Twenty-sixth street from Pennsylvania avenue to M street north; thence along M street into Georgetown, to connect with their tracks on Bridge street.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Will this prohibit the company from crossing to Georgetown by the present bridge?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; on the ground that the great water mains under there are being injured by the shock and jar of those heavy cars going over.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Will this provision materially impair the connection with Georgetown?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the navy-yard at League Island: For the continuation of work and removal of property from the Philadelphia navy-yard, $200,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the presiding member of the board of revision of taxes of the city and county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, are hereby created a commission for the purpose of making sale and conveyance of all the lands, docks, wharves, real property and appurtenances, rights, interests, and privileges of the United States included within the limits of, and known as the navy-yard in, the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania; that for the purpose aforesaid they shall, if they think best for the public interest, have the said property divided into lots or plots, and laid out into blocks and streets, conforming, as far as the interests of the Government will permit, to the blocks and streets of the said city in the vicinity of the said navy-yard; and they shall have the said property fairly appraised in such lots or portions as they think best, and shall have power to sell the same, or any portion thereof, to be paid for in cash within thirty days after making such sale, and, upon the receipt of such payment, to make good conveyance and title for the property sold and paid for to the purchasers or their assigns; that the money so received, less the necessary expenses of this commission, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and an amount equal to the sum so paid in is hereby appropriated to be expended by the Navy Department in removing the movable property of the Philadelphia navy-yard to League Island, and in building the necessary docks, wharves, shops, and buildings at League Island, and preparing the same for carrying on the business and work of a navy-yard at that place: Provided, however, That not more than one-third of the appraised value of the said property hereby authorized to be sold shall be expended within the next fiscal year: And provided also, That the said commission shall make a definite and specific report of all their doings under this authority to Congress at its next regular session, and at each regular session thereafter while said sale shall remain uncompleted.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by inserting after the words "sell the same or any portion thereof" the words "at public auction."

Mr. RANDALL. I have been before the Committee on Appropriations on this subject; and I think they have an amendment of this sort which is drawn with more fullness.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by inserting at the point indicated in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] these words:

At public auction, after thirty days' notice in three daily papers of the largest circulation in the city of Philadelphia, at not less than the appraised value.

Mr. MYERS. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my amendment, as this covers the same ground.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to suggest to the gentleman having charge of this matter that there should be some persons added to this commission. Of necessity the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury can seldom be present to perform this service; and hence the provision in its present form leaves the whole duty practically in the hands of one man, the presiding member of the board of revision of taxes. I have nothing to say against that gentleman. On the contrary I have everything to say in his favor. He is a very proper person for this duty; but I should like to add two other public officers. I do not care particularly who they may be. I am unwilling to put this entire duty of appraisement and sale and everything connected with it, practically into the hands of one man.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to suggest to my colleague that "the three members of the board of tax revision" be inserted, with a clause providing that in consultations of the commissioners these three officers shall vote as one; otherwise they would constitute a majority of the commission.

Mr. RANDALL. I accede to that suggestion. It evidently would not be proper that three men disconnected with the General Government should have the power to outvote upon any question the two officers representing the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. That difficulty occurred to my mind; and hence the amendment I have suggested

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will state the reason for putting the provision in the form in which it stands in the bill. Here is a large property, worth millions of dollars, to be sold for the benefit of the General Government. If we constitute a board, the majority of whom are Philadelphians there will always be a jealousy outside and a fear that the interests of the Government have not been properly protected. Hence the commission was made to consist of the Secretary of the Navy, which was deemed proper as his Department is largely interested, and the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the Treasury of the United States; and then consultation was had as to what officer of the city of Philadelphia would best represent the knowledge appropriate to this particular matter, and it was finally agreed that the president of the board of revision of taxes would be that man, and he would bring to the board just what is needed and the only thing needed, knowledge as to this land. I should object to a board being created the majority of which were Philadelphians. I can trust them as far as anybody, but if I were selling land in Boston or Washington or Annapolis——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Or Portland.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Or Portland or Lowell or anywhere else, I would jealously care it should only be represented so that knowledge should be brought to the board. I think it better to leave it as now, and the President can take advice and consult with his associates, and other gentlemen will consult with him of course. Depend upon it it will be more satisfactory if there be but one man on the board from the city of Philadelphia. I hope the gentlemen from Philadelphia will not oppose this, because it is in the interest of the Government this land should be sold and a new navy-yard built up.

Mr. MYERS. I suggest that the proposition of my colleague provide they shall all have but one vote. It does not propose each shall vote; but only they shall all have one vote.

Mr. RANDALL. Their judgment is desirable. They are the three officers chosen by law to make assessments throughout the city and county of Philadelphia. I do not care about their voting. I wish their judgment as to the value of this property. The law under which they are appointed provides the three shall not be of the same party. I think, therefore, it is very proper these three men, as suggested by my colleague from the fourth district, should have one vote for the decision of this matter. This is a large sum to be realized. It will certainly be $2,000,000, perhaps $3,000,000. It is an old saying that two heads are better than one, and therefore mathematically three are better than two. I think we should include the whole board of revision of taxes, allowing them one vote.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 43.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. HALE, of Maine, were appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman ask for a further count?

Mr. RANDALL. I have no idea of putting this in the hands of one man. I do ask for a further count.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 67.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move to insert "and the Chief Engineer of the Navy."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care who he is, provided, he is a man of judgment.

I think it unfortunate property appraised at $2,000,000 should be disposed of by a number of men the majority of whom are Philadelphians. I think it altogether better to have some one outside of Philadelphia on it, so that Philadelphians in reference to property to be disposed of in that city should not have the whole controlling interest.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to strike out the whole clause.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say in reply in reference to this amendment of my colleague that the three members of this board are only to cast one vote.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It is apparent to every gentleman, this property being in Philadelphia, these men will be subject to immense pressure from outside.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This seems to be a Philadelphia matter altogether, and I wipe my hands of it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER'S amendment was adopted.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to strike out the whole paragraph.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 90.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I give notice that I shall call for the yeas and nays in the House on the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to purchase, in accordance with his public bid therefor, the Stevens iron-clad steam-battery, together with expense of removal to the Brooklyn navy-yard, $150,000: Provided, That said battery, after purchase, shall not be fitted up until a specific appropriation therefor is made, unless in case of warlike emergency:

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to strike out that paragraph, as this Stevens battery is utterly useless for any other purpose than to be sold for old iron.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This Stevens battery is worth this sum of money for old iron and the Government will lose nothing on that score; but it will probably be worth one hundred times that amount. Nobody can say with authority that it is a failure. It is an immense structure. They have put into it between two and three million dollars. It is there all ready for removal. If it is not bought by us it is likely to be bought by some foreign power and taken away, and at some future day we may be sorry we did not buy it. It was put up at auction and the Secretary of the Navy made a conditional bid, leaving to Congress to pass upon it. Finding this Government was to bid, other governments who had sent agents here did not enter into competition with us. But if we do not take it, then it will be open to foreign powers to purchase it and perhaps make out of it the most formidable structure of that kind that was ever made.

Now I need not go into the question whether if this were a matter of appropriating three or four million dollars this would be a good investment, or whether it would be worth that money. But that it is worth $150,000, and that at that price it is a good investment, I have no doubt. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] himself will examine the matter I think he will come to that conclusion. It is not good policy for us when we can get this for so small a sum to let it be taken away from us by some foreign power.

The appropriation has been guarded by the proviso that no expense shall be put upon the battery until Congress appropriates for that purpose.

The question being taken on the motion to strike out the paragraph there were ayes 17, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph under the title "Department of Agriculture:"

And the unexpended sum heretofore appropriated for the purchase of Duby's cryptogamic herbarium, or as much thereof as may be necessary, not exceeding $1,000, is hereby continued and rendered available for the purchase of a collection of fungi or other cryptogams.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the paragraph just read the following:
For compensation and expenses of Dr. Franklin B. Hough, of New York, to collect statistics and information relating to preservation and cultivation of forests in the United States, the same to be reported to the next session of Congress, $3,000.

Mr. POTTER. Upon my word!

Mr. SPEER. That is too bad.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to make one remark, if the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

It will be recollected that at the last session of Congress the President of the United States reported to Congress, by a special message, the deliberations of a scientific association which met in the city of Portland, in which the whole subject of forest culture and preservation was discussed. This subject was brought before the Committee on the Public Lands by instructions of the House of Representatives; and Dr. Hough, of New York, who was then a stranger to the committee, came before it and enabled the Committee on the Public Lands to prepare a report, which was printed, and some six or eight thousand copies of it were sent everywhere throughout the United States. That report has awakened, very properly, a great deal of interest in the very important question how we may preserve the forests of the United States, and how we may cultivate forest trees.

There is everywhere a call for information. This Dr. Hough has made this subject a specialty. He has been in France and in Germany and in other countries of Europe, has visited the schools of forestry there, and is the most intelligent man in America upon that subject. And this sum of money is but a mere trifle compared with the great interests that are involved.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted on, the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. SPEER. It is insisted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I offer the following as an additional paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of a site and making plans and specifications for a public building at Auburn, New York, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; the same being in accordance with the recommendation of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that there is no law authorizing this appropriation.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. There was a bill reported last session authorizing this building.

The CHAIRMAN. Did it become a law? [After a pause.] As no law is pointed out to authorize the appropriation, the Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. COOK. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as an additional section the following:
For continuation of building for custom-house and post-office at Atlanta, Georgia, the sum of $50,000.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 37, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. COOK. I call for tellers; but before they are ordered I desire to say a word.

Congress passed at its last session an act limiting the appropriation for a custom-house and post-office at Atlanta, Georgia, to $250,000. A lot was selected by the architect of the Government as a site, and $60,000 paid for it. This sum provides an appropriation of $50,000 to commence the work on the building.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. COOK were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 66, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuation of building for custom-house and post-office, Cincinnati, Ohio, $600,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the paragraph just read the following proviso:
Provided, That the cost of said building, when completed, shall not exceed the limitation now fixed by law, $3,500,000, exclusive of title. And the Architect of the Treasury shall prosecute the work upon said building upon such plans and specifications as that the same, when fully completed, shall not exceed said limitation.

Mr. BANNING. That is the law now.

Mr. GARFIELD. There can be no objection to that. All that is the law now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer an amendment making appropriations for which the estimates came in after the bill was made up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as additional paragraphs the following:
For completing the court-house and post-office at Indianapolis, Indiana, $12,000.
For completion of building for United States post-office and court-house at New York, including cost of heating and ventilating apparatus, and the cost of area along park front, as per report of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, $388,160.88.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to put a proviso there that that shall be advertised for and the contract given to the lowest bidder.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, this is for the completion of the New York building. It would have gone into the deficiency bill but for the fact that the expenditure could not be made within the next year. It is partly a deficiency and partly for completing the work not yet done. Now, if the gentleman undertakes to put on this provision, it will be impossible to arrange the work.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to insert "provided it shall not interfere with existing contracts."

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will see at once the whole process of this building is on a different plan; and to propose to adopt a new plan now, when they are about putting on the attic story, would be absurd. I hope the committee will not consent to it.

Mr. RANDALL. Go ahead. I withdraw the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuation of building for post-office and court-house, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, $750,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the cost of the said building shall not exceed, when completed, the limitation now fixed by law, and the Architect of the Treasury shall prosecute such work on such specifications as that the cost of the work, when completed, shall not exceed the said limitation of $4,000,000, including the cost of site.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that proposals be advertised for and the work be let to the lowest bidder. I do not ask for other places what I would not ask for my own city. I think it should be done everywhere.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be done, then, upon buildings not already stated.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will simply say this, Mr. Chairman: For the reason that the Architect of the Treasury now in office may have, and I think has, some delicacy in modifying the plans of his predecessor I offer this amendment, so that he may consider himself authorized to change and modify the plans made with the requirements of law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his motion?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuation of building for appraisers' stores, San Francisco, California. $50,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000." I believe that the work can be done during the coming year, and it would be bad economy to let it run on longer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuation of building for custom-house and post-office, Saint Louis, Missouri, $700,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the cost of said building when fully completed shall not exceed the limitation now fixed by law, $4,000,000. And the Architect of the Treasury is required to prosecute said work upon such plans and specifications as that the same shall when completed not exceed said limitation.

Mr. STANARD. I hope that amendment will not pass, for these reasons: It was expected when the site was selected for the purpose of constructing this building in the city of Saint Louis that there would be no difficulty in laying the foundation; but after the work was commenced we found it was quicksand, so that they have had to expend a very large amount of money not contemplated on the work. The truth is that they have been at work for the past year almost exclusively on extra work that was not contemplated on the work, but work that could not be avoided, and I hope that this amendment will not be adopted.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 1499:

That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of a site and construction of a building for a post-office and other Government use in the city of Sacramento, California: Provided, That the cost of said site and building shall not when completed and ready for use exceed the sum of $100,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point of order that there is no law for that expenditure.

Mr. PAGE. There is already a law in existence which brings this amendment outside of the point of order. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to make an examination and report to Congress the terms upon which suitable sites can be obtained for the erection of any needed public buildings in Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania, and Sacramento, California.

Approved June 7, 1872.

Mr. GARFIELD. That does not authorize the building; it merely authorizes an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. It only authorizes an examination and report.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph the following:

For continuation of building for post-office, United States circuit and district courts at Ithaca, New York, $40,000; and the limitation heretofore existing under the act of May 31, 1872, is hereby repealed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point of order that that work has not been begun at all.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. This is $10,000 less than the estimates submitted to the Committee on Appropriations. The land has been purchased in accordance with the law of the date named in the amendment. I think there can be no objection to it. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations may see, the Secretary of the Treasury estimated for $50,000, and my amendment asks for but $40,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that $40,000 is beyond the limitation fixed by the act. The act limits the building and site to $200,000. One hundred and sixty-eight thousand has already been paid for the site, and there remains a balance of $32,000. The amount here asked for exceeds the limitation for the building.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. This is according to the law upon the statute-book.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the law upon the statute-book fixes the limitation at $200,000. I am sorry to be ungracious to my very good friend, but I have been obliged to be so to others.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. This is the only building that stands upon this footing, except the one at Fall River, which the committee have put into this bill in the identical phrase which I copy here.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Has any work been done on this building?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The land has been purchased under the law.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS,] being on the Committee on Ways and Means, now that the tax bill is defeated in the Senate, as I understand, how he expects to pay for all these appropriations?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. In the same way that the river and harbor appropriations are to be paid.

Mr. CONGER. The House will provide that that be done, whether there are more taxes or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The latter clause of the amendment repeals the existing law in terms. It provides that "the limitation heretofore existing under the act of May 31, 1872, is hereby repealed."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Then I will withdraw that clause and ask a vote on the appropriation.

Mr. FORT. Is not the point of order good against the appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio to say that there are some $38,000 yet unexpended.

Mr. GARFIELD. The whole appropriation was made last year, and there remains $38,000 unexpended. Not one dollar can now be appropriated without going beyond the limitation of the act.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Ohio waived all that in regard to Fall River.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not waive it; the committee waived it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair cannot see his way except to rule the amendment out.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Then I will reduce the appropriation to $38,000.

Mr. FORT. That is still subject to the point of order, for the gentleman says that the whole amount has already been appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I move to amend by inserting the following:

For a building for post-office and court-house at Grand Rapids, Michigan, $50,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve the right to raise the point of order until I can see whether there is one.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a law authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Certainly there is; $70,000 has been appropriated for the site, and my amendment asks for $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment comes within the limitation?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. It does.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no point of order that can be made against this amendment. I will say that the Treasury is not in a condition to justify our engaging upon any new buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know that; I only make it as an argument.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MACDOUGALL offered the following amendment:

For the purpose of making plans and specifications for a public building at Auburn, New York, $4,000; the same being in accordance with the recommendation of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I suppose the same point of order lies against this which was raised against my amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. As I understand this, it is in reference to plans and specifications in reference to future design and appropriation for a building.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The same point of order made against my amendment is just as applicable to this.

Mr. FIELD. The point of order is good against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If no point of order be made against the amendment the vote will be taken on it.

Mr. FORT. I wish to say that if this is subject to the point of order, I think we should raise it. It has been raised on me every time.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For out-buildings, sewerage, fencing, and grading for building marine hospital, San Francisco, California, $10,709.90.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out "$10,709.90" and in lieu thereof insert "$15,900." A letter from the Treasury Department will show the reason for this:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1875.

SIR: Referring to the item in the pending sundry civil appropriation bill, page 62, line 1505, as follows, "For out-buildings, sewerage, fencing, and grading building for marine hospital, San Francisco, California, $10,709.90," I have the honor to inclose a letter from the Supervising Architect, under date of the 23d instant, calling attention to an error in the above amount.

It appears that the original estimate of the superintendent of construction which the Supervising Architect received was for $53,599.46 in gold; the amount appropriated (17 Statutes, 421) was $58,789.56, or $5,190.10 in excess of the above estimate, being its currency value. The estimate of the superintendent for the item in the pending bill was $15,900 in gold; but through inadvertence nothing was allowed by the Department for the difference between gold and currency, and the additional error was also made of deducting the $5,190.10 appropriated originally in excess of the former estimate.

In correction of these errors, I have the honor to recommend that the above quoted paragraph be amended so that provision be made for the appropriation of $17,808 for the purpose specified.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move the following amendment:

Provided, That where, in the opinion of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, any public building now in course of construction and for which appropriations are made in this bill, and the ultimate cost of which is limited by law, will, according to the plans and specifications now being carried out, exceed such limitation, the architect shall revise and so modify the plans and specifications as that such building will not exceed, when completed, the limitation fixed by law; and if any such building cannot be brought within such limitation, then no further expenditure shall be made upon the same until authority is given by law.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to speak on that proposition. It is a very good one if the building is just commenced or about to be commenced, but where buildings have been partially erected on plans, and where additional expense is necessary, however small, to complete them, this will authorize the suspension of the work, and there can be no possible necessity for it. Gentlemen have already provided for the large buildings that the plans and specifications shall be limited according to the appropriation by law. This is intended to cover all buildings which have meager appropriations, and it will require the suspension of all work if in the judgment of one man the estimates fall short of the proposed appropriation. There can be no propriety in passing such a provision. The gentleman, in his zeal to secure this limitation to cover all these small buildings, although in reference to the large buildings the limitation has been properly made, may do more injury than good. In reference to the class of small buildings where small appropriations have been made, work upon them will be stopped before the meeting of another session of Congress, and they will be left in an unfinished state. So there will be more damage by reason of the passage of this amendment than the small additional amount which would be required to complete the building.

I oppose the passage of this joint slaughter-house amendment, and hope it will be voted down.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to say one word in defense of the amendment. I presume there is not a public building in the country constructed in the last year which has not cost over two to four times as much as was appropriated by law. The law fixed the limitation at the start in the construction of these buildings. They have gone beyond the limitation of the law almost without a single exception. We appropriated for these buildings, fixing the limit of cost, but uniformly that limit has been exceeded, and buildings have been made to cost from two to four times as much as was originally intended. There has been no respect paid to the law of Congress at all in this respect. It is not right and proper that it shall continue longer. I specially demand, in the name of the people of the country, that something should be done to put an end to this state of things. We want the limit as put by law upon the cost of the building shall be observed by the officers whose duty it is to execute the law and in no case shall the appropriation be exceeded. I hold no officer has the right to exceed the limit of the law any more than he has to take money out of the Treasury without authority of law.

Mr. CONGER. I move to insert the words "hereafter commenced," so the general provision will not apply to any buildings already commenced and partially completed, but to buildings which may hereafter be commenced.

Mr. WELLS. By the adoption of this amendment, Mr. Chairman, we are going to stop the work on the public buildings at Saint Louis. My colleague has already spoken of the extraordinary expenses incurred there in making the foundation. That will increase the cost of the building beyond the limitation fixed by law. The fact is when that bill passed we only expected to have to lay the foundation. The foundation we have there has gone down thirty-eight feet, and instead of finding rock we found quicksand, and the result will be that the great expense of what is now proposed would prevent the Architect from going on.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we ought not to pass this with reference to buildings in course of construction, except only those so recently begun that the change can be made. I have made the clause apply to new buildings.

Mr. WELLS. There can be no objection to that. The material for this building is nearly all prepared, the foundations are laid, and no changes can now be made unless you abandon the iron work inside and put in wood.

The question being taken on Mr. CONGER's amendment to the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Now the whole thing can be voted down.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to be heard. I move to strike out the last word.

I have offered my amendment in good faith, considering it my duty as a member of the House to do what I can to advance the interests of the country. I understood the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to be offered in good faith; but after it has been adopted he says, "Now vote down the entire thing."

I have said before, and I repeat it, that the public service of this country has begun to be a disgrace to the country in the way it is carried on by the officers of the Government. The little I have done to-day has been with a desire to recover in some degree that service, and to have it carried on according to law. I may in doing so have contracted the ill-will of some gentlemen on this floor, but I have endeavored to do my duty.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] having secured a most splendid public building in his own city has no objection to dealing harshly or gently as the case may be with buildings in other cities. And I wish to state another thing. I am very much surprised that a gentleman who has been so many long years in Congress as the gentleman from Iowa has been should plead here his ignorance of what is so frequently done by members in offering an amendment to defeat a bill or another amendment. I have always considered that a member was at liberty to endeavor to defeat a measure in that way or any other way that he found best adapted to his purpose. In this case I wanted first to destroy the life of the amendment and then to defeat it.

The question being taken on Mr. LOUGHRIDGE's amendment, as amended, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

And hereafter no money shall be paid nor contracts made for payment for any site for a public building in excess of the amount specifically appropriated therefor; and no money shall be expended upon any public building on which work has not yet been actually begun until after drawings and specifications, together with detailed estimates of the cost thereof, shall have been made by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and said plans and estimates shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all appropriations made for the construction of such building shall be expended within the limitations of the act authorizing the same or limiting the cost thereof; and no change of said plan involving an increase of expense exceeding 10 per cent. of the amount to which said building was limited shall be allowed or paid by any officer of the Government without the special authority of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. This section, after the first clause ending with the words "appropriated therefor," is liable to the point of order, and I make it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The rules were suspended to make it in order.

Mr. MAYNARD. As the law now stands it requires plans and estimates to be approved not only by the Secretary of the Treasury but by the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Interior; and it seems to me that this section is letting down the guards heretofore insisted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules having been suspended to allow this paragraph to be offered, the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out all after the words "appropriated therefor" to the end of the paragraph. As the law now stands the plans and specifications must first be approved by three heads of Departments, and I think it is much better that it should stand in that way than that they should be left to the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury alone.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say only a word on this. The committee think that this is most fatal as a new departure in the work of constructing public buildings. The principle embodied here will protect us in the future from the evils most justly complained of in regard to the erection of public buildings according to the methods now in operation.

The first step is for a man to get an investigation for a site. The next is a little appropriation to enable the Government to accept the site and pay the expense of the title. Next year an appropriation is asked to pay for the site, because the people did not give it. The next step is to put on an appropriation for a very small building, limiting the cost to $200,000. Next year that limit is passed. Next year the limit is enlarged. Next year there is an appropriation to finish the building at a cost it may be of a million and a half of dollars. That is a rough and fair history of almost all the buildings we have erected in the last fifteen years. We propose by this that hereafter no money shall be expended, no contract entered into, no indebtedness incurred, no account audited by any accounting officer of the Treasury until plans and specifications and detailed estimates have been made and approved by the proper officers.

Now, if we have left out anything we ought to have put in I would be glad to have that added. But this provides that the plans and estimates shall be made by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and that they shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. And I hope this will stand as the best piece of protective legislation we have thus far adopted in this branch of the public service.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out the last word. Does the gentleman from Ohio controvert what I said about the present state of the law?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not controvert it; I only ask the gentleman to show me the section of the law.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would do it if I had time to look it up.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will hand it to the gentleman myself if I can find it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will move as an amendment to add after the words "Secretary of the Treasury" the words "Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster-General."

Mr. GARFIELD. The Secretary of the Interior has nothing to do with any of these buildings.

Mr. MAYNARD. He has charge of the court-houses.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; they are under the Attorney-General.

Mr. MAYNARD. I beg your pardon; they are under the Secretary of the Interior.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is now exhausted on the pending amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. MAYNARD's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as an additional section, to come in at the end of section 1. I do not desire to have it read. It is the bill that passed the House reorganizing the Treasury Department with two or three slight modifications, which I will state. I will also state the reason why I offer it here. The Senate Committee reported the bill, but they also reported a resolution to provide that a committee of five Senators should sit during the recess and look into the Department. They had not time to take up the bill, but they had time to pass that resolution. I have made the provision for the second deputy commissioner in the Internal Revenue Department to correspond with the appropriation bill, and I have made the salary of the Register of the Treasury $4,500 a year, to correspond with other officers of the same class as arranged last year, and I have made the one hundred counters and copyists as in the appropriation bill. The bill still will require an appropriation of about $10,000 less than was appropriated this year in the legislative bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it can be adopted by unanimous consent I will not object. I understand the gentleman from Connecticut to say that it is precisely what the House passed the other day.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I say this. I say that the Internal Revenue Bureau corresponds as to the second deputy to the provision made in the appropriation bill for that Bureau, and that this bill makes the salary of the Register $4,500 per annum, the same salary that was fixed for the Assistant Secretaries, the Commissioner of Customs, and other officers last year, and to which the Senate agreed. I do not see any necessity for reading the bill. There is a change of divisions in the Second Comptroller's Office, but it does not go beyond the appropriation bill.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to inquire of the gentleman if the bill is precisely the same bill as was passed the other day with the modifications which he has indicated?

Mr. KELLOGG, It is.

Mr. CESSNA. Then I beg that it be adopte d without reading. It was read and considered section by section the other day, and there can be no necessity for reading it now.

Mr. SENER. I object to its adoption without reading.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I ask the gentleman from Connecticut to withdraw it and offer it in the House under a suspension of the rules when the committee rises.

Mr. KELLOGG. I call for a vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. A single member can insist on the amendment being read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I ask the gentleman not to insist on the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. The rules were suspended to allow it to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. The rules were suspended to allow it to be offered as an amendment, but any gentleman has a right to call for its reading when offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it and offer it under a suspension of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment being passed on by the committee without being read?

Several members objected.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw my objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I offer the following amendment:

For continuation of building for court-house and post-office at Utica, New York, $35,000; and the limitation heretofore existing, under act of May 31, 1872, is hereby repealed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like the gentleman to explain how it is that an appropriation of $200,000 for a public building has been so nearly expended on the site?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The point of order on that amendment is not waived.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I will state that a site was purchased, under arrangements which the Architect of the Treasury approved.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not raise any point of order this time on the amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But I raise the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is too late; it has been debated.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Debate has been had upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa raised the point of order long ago.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I desire to say that it has already been ruled that a limitation on an appropriation bill is in the nature of a monition to another, but does not make out of order an additional appropriation; and I ask my colleague from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to give a case bearing upon that point.

Mr. WHEELER. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a decision of the Speaker during the last Congress, which settles the whole matter so far as this point of order is concerned.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The precedent which my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] cites arose on a public building.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. If the point of order had been raised the Chair would have been compelled to overrule it. As the question will occur again, the Chair wishes to make this statement: Restrictions or limitations of a former Congress have never been taken as the slightest limitation or restriction upon the action of the existing Congress. Such limitations are merely monitions.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is true as a general proposition. One Congress cannot limit the action of another Congress; but when one Congress authorizes a building, and says that the money appropriated for that building shall be expended upon a plan limited to a certain amount, I take it that that kind of limitation will require a change of law to get rid of it.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I ask the Clerk to read the rest of the decision.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAWES. When Congress created a law that it should be unlawful to expend more than $125,000, and that no more than $125,000 should be appropriated, then when we appropriate the balance of the $125,000 does the Chair rule that there is authority of law for any additional sum?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course; that settles it.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Let the Clerk read on.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. No; but the Chair does this: under the rules of the House appropriations for public works in the process of construction are within the judgment of the House then considering the appropriation bill and not that of any preceding House. No preceding restriction can govern the House.

Mr. DAWES. There is a law that this shall not cost over $125,000, and that any expenditure beyond that shall be unlawful.

The SPEAKER. That is a restriction upon the officers who have the expenditure of the money, and they should be punished for going beyond the requirements of the law.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. That shows that the point of order does not lie against the amendment which I have the honor to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. How does this amendment differ from the other amendment of the gentleman on which the point of order was raised?

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not, except as to amount.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I beg leave to call the attention of the Chair to this fact: I introduce this amendment, and cite the authority of a decision of the Speaker of the House to show that a restriction by a former Congress is not binding upon a succeeding Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the ruling on this amendment should be the same as on the other.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I ask the Chair to consider the ruling of the Speaker which I submitted to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand that the objections are all withdrawn to my amendment for the reorganizing the Treasury Department.

Mr. BURCHARD. It does not appear to me, from a hasty reading of the amendment at the Clerk's desk, that this is the same as the proposition that was passed by the House.

Mr. CESSNA. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] has stated that there is no difference, except such as he stated, and which everybody understands.

Mr. GARFIELD. While that is being done, I ask the committee to allow the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] He finds in the statute that the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Postmaster-General are a board of officers to approve the plans for public buildings.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the Clerk to read section 3734 of the Revised Statutes, and gentlemen will see that it is a more stringent proposition than is proposed here.

The Clerk read as follows:

Before any new buildings for the use of the United States are commenced, the plans and full estimates therefor shall be prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Interior, and the cost of each building shall not exceed the amount of such estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] it will be considered as adopted. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment accordingly was adopted.

Mr. CONGER. Now for the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that amendment?

Mr. BURCHARD. Upon the assurances of the gentleman I withdraw my objections.

Mr. SHANKS. I want to know of the gentleman how many persons will be turned out of office by this amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. None at all.

Mr. SHANKS. How do you know that?

Mr. KELLOGG. It decreases only to the extent that there are now vacancies.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to make this remark. June 23, 1874, Congress provided for paying two months' extra pay to those turned out of office by the effect of our legislation. If this is a measure to turn persons out of office, I insist upon offering an amendment in connection with this matter that the persons so discharged shall receive two months' extra pay.

Mr. CESSNA. There will not be anybody turned out.

Mr. KELLOGG. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. SHANKS. How does the gentleman know that he is not mistaken in what he states?

Mr. KELLOGG. I know it in this way: In certain branches of the Department leading officers have stated that they need just so much force and no more, and they have no more there. In some places there are vacancies.

Mr. CESSNA. And they do not want to fill those vacancies.

Mr. KELLOGG. This is the same bill the House has already passed, with the exceptions I have already stated.

Mr. SHANKS. This proposition cuts down the pay of some persons and increases the wages of others; and, as I think, it will discharge some persons from the Treasury Department.

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not cut down the wages of any person, man or woman.

Mr. SHANKS. I have been so informed. I insist that the amendment I have indicated should be added to this proposition.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to that amendment; but it will be inoperative, because nobody will be turned out.

Mr. CESSNA. It is very easy to provide for a decrease of the force without turning anybody out, because in some Bureaus there are certain vacancies, and this bill is so arranged that those vacancies shall not be filled. Hence the force will be decreased without turning anybody out.

Mr. SHANKS. I concede that there is a marked difference between turning an individual out of office and preventing one from being appointed.

Mr. FORT. Does this amendment correspond with the original bill of the gentleman from Connecticut, or is it the proposition with the amendments adopted by the House, including the one providing that all appointments should be distributed equally among the several States?

Mr. KELLOGG. That provision is included. This is the bill as passed by the House, with the two exceptions I have stated.

Mr. MERRIAM. Does the gentleman suppose it will be possible to carry out that provision in regard to the distribution of appointments?

Mr. GARFIELD. I fear that if this amendment be adopted it will load down the bill and cause too much delay by the additional work it will impose upon our clerks in engrossing it.

The amendment of Mr. KELLOGG was agreed to.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. For the purpose of making plans and specifications for a public building at Auburn, New York, the sum of $4,000, the same being in accordance with the recommendation of the Treasury Department, through the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That to carry into effect the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint the following force, to be employed under his direction, namely: Two chief clerks, at $2,200 each; eight clerks of class four; nine clerks of class three; ten clerks of class two; thirty-five clerks of class one; seventy-five clerks, at $900 each; six messengers; five assistant messengers; and three laborers; and for stationery and other necessary incidental expenses, $10,000; for which the sum of $177,500 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And at the end of each month, the Secretary shall reimburse the Treasury to the full amount paid out under the provisions of this paragraph by transfer of said amount from the deposit of the national banking associations with the Treasury of the United States; and at the end of each fiscal year, he shall transfer from said deposit, to the Treasury of the United States, such sum as may have been actually expended under his direction for stationery, rent, fuel, light, and other necessary incidental expenses which have been incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of the said section of the above-named act.

Mr. WHEELER. I was deputed by the Committee on Appropriations to make personal examination of the Redemption Bureau and the Banking and Currency Bureau. As the result of my examination, I submit a substitute for the first part of this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "namely," in line 7, the following:

Two chief clerks, at $2,200 each; eight clerks of class four; nine clerks of class three; ten clerks of class two; thirty-five clerks of class one; seventy-five clerks, at $900 each; six messengers; five assistant messengers: and three laborers; and for stationery and other incidental expenses, $10,000; for which the sum of $177,500 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And insert the following:

In the office of the Treasurer: One superintendent, $3,500; two principal tellers and one principal book-keeper, at $2,600 each; one assistant principal book-keeper, at $2,500; two assistant tellers, at $2,200; two clerks of class four; two clerks of class three; four clerks of class two; forty-four clerks of class one; twenty clerks, at $1,000 each; sixty clerks, at $900 each; four messengers; five assistant messengers; and three persons to be employed, at $432 each, for which the sum of $166,656 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

In the office of the Comptroller of the Currency: One superintendent, $2,400; one clerk of class four; four clerks of class one; twenty clerks, at $900 each; and teller and one principal book-keeper, at $2,400 each; one assistant book-keeper, at $2,200; one messenger; for which the sum of $34,840 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MERRIAM. I wish to state to the House that the Comptroller of the Currency in his annual report to this House states that the chief object of the law creating this Redemption Bureau was to purify the currency.

Nothing but stupidity and ignorance can pardon any Bureau officer for telling law-makers what they intended after he failed to comprehend our intention. We aimed at something higher than purification of currency—it was to set at work forces upon society that would compel bank credits only upon industrial products, which will prepare the way to specie payment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That for experiments in testing iron and steel, including the cost of any machine built for such purpose, the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated; and the further sum of $25,000, provided "for improved machinery and instruments for testing American iron and steel," in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1874," approved March 3, 1873, is hereby continued and made available for such purpose; and that the President be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a board, to consist of one officer of engineers of the United States Army, one officer of ordnance of the United States Army, one line officer of the United States Navy, one engineer of the United States Navy, and three civilians who shall be experts; and it shall be the duty of said board to convene at the earliest practicable moment, at such place as may be designated by the President, for the purpose of determining, by actual tests, the strength and value of all kinds of iron, steel, and other metals which may be submitted to them or by them procured, and to prepare tables which will exhibit the strength and value of said materials for constructive and mechanical purposes, and to provide for the building of a suitable machine for establishing such tests: Provided, That no officers in the pay of the Government shall be entitled to, or receive, any additional compensation by reason of any services rendered in connection with this board; but one of the civil experts shall act as secretary of the board, and shall be entitled, under this act, to such compensation as the President may deem proper and fit: Provided, That not more than $15,000 of the sum herein provided shall be used for the expenses of such board, and the balance shall be used in the construction of the machine aforesaid.

Mr. FORT. I move to amend by inserting after the word "determining," in line 18, the words "under the direction of the Chief of Ordnance." This amendment has been handed to me by a gentleman who has left the Hall.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we ought not to put this great commission under the control of one person. This provision was adopted after very full consultation with the board of engineers; and if this amendment be adopted, all the officers there will feel themselves subordinated to this one man. Let this be a commission; and let them make their tests as the board in their free choice shall direct.

I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. FORT. I have nothing further to say about it.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I move to amend by striking out these words:

But one of the civil experts shall act as secretary of the board, and shall be entitled, under this act, to such compensation as the President may deem proper and fit.

There is no need of having a civilian to act as secretary to this board; an officer can be detailed for the purpose.

I make this motion in behalf of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] who is not now here. There are good reasons which could be given, if necessary—reasons coming from the Department—why the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw this amendment. This section has been carefully considered. It is a compromise measure, in which a number of interests are involved; and if you now allow one class, namely, the Ordnance Department, to come in and fix it up in this way, it will be likely to disturb the whole arrangement.

Mr. FORT. Why is a civilian put in as secretary?

Mr. NEGLEY. It will cost the Government far less to have a civilian than to detail an officer for this purpose.

Mr. FORT. I learn it takes one or two years to construct this machine.

Mr. NEGLEY. There is no proposition contained in this bill of more importance to the industrial interests of the whole country or to the safety of life and property than this section. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. FORT. An officer of the Army detailed for this purpose can act as secretary, and will not cost anything at all.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. To enable the Executive Departments of the Government and the Smithsonian Institution to participate in the international exhibition of 1876, the following sums are hereby appropriated, namely: For the Interior Department, $115,000; for the Treasury Department, $5,000; for the Post-Office Department, $5,000; for the Agricultural Department, $50,000; for the Smithsonian Institution, $67,000; for the United States Commission of Food-Fishes, $5,000; for the War Department, $133,000; for the Navy Department, $100,000; for show-cases, shelving, stationery, postage, telegrams, expressage, and other necessary incidental expenses, $25,000; in all, $505,000; to be disbursed under the direction of the board of Executive Departments appointed in pursuance of the presidential order of January 23, 1874. And authority is hereby given to the heads of the several Executive Departments to display at the international exhibition of 1876, under such conditions as they may prescribe, subject to the provisions of section 7 of the act of June 1, 1872, all such articles in store or under the control of the said Departments as may be necessary or desirable to render such collection complete and exhaustive: Provided, That should it become necessary to erect any building or part of a building for said exhibition on the part of the Government, the same shall be paid for pro rata out of the sums appropriated to the several Departments, the United States Commission of Food-Fishes and the Treasury and Post-Office Departments excepted, the cost of the building not to exceed $150,000; and at the close of the exhibition said building shall be sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: And provided further, That the sums hereby appropriated shall cover the entire expense to which the United States Government shall be subjected on account of said exhibition, except the sum appropriated in this act for printing the certificates of stock of said exhibition; and the head of each Department of the Government is forbidden to expend any larger sum than is set down herein for his Department, or to enter into any contract or engagement that shall result in any such increased expenditure; and no money shall be taken by any Department for the purposes of this exhibition as aforesaid from any other appropriations except the one hereby made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move in line 42 to strike out the word "is"

and insert "and the board or executive department is." Also in line 43 strike out the word "his" and insert the word "each."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to add to the paragraph these words: "And further provided, that of the sum hereby appropriated the sum of $200,000 shall be immediately available."

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to strike out $115,000 for the Interior Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on this subject. We are asked here to unite in contributing to the centennial exhibition, when these halls have hardly ceased to echo with such denunciations of the people I have the honor in part to represent as, I think, are more suited to describe wild savages than civilized beings. The gentleman from Michigan used words, to say the least, which were wild and violent. The gentleman from Indiana took occasion to speak of the people of Alabama as having no more respect than savages for human rights. But right on the heels of that, gentlemen who have been selected, I suppose, as a type of their party, the one to conduct an investigation and the other to champion the "force" measure, come here now and ask southern representatives to a grand fraternal meeting.

Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, something of the people who have been talked about in that way. My tongue was tied at the time, by the rules of the House, but now I have the opportunity.

I found to-day in this bill, and I rose to oppose it, but the Chairman cut me off, an appropriation for $45,000 for a hospital for colored people. I take it there is one for white people too in this District. Why are they not in the same hospital with the whites? Eight years ago in my own city, at a time when southern republicans were pulled down——

Mr. McKEE. Who pulled them down?

Mr. BROMBERG. Republicans pulled them down upon suggesting negro suffrage, because it was something that would destroy the republican party of the State of Ohio at that time. At that time, my people, having no regard to color, at an expense of $15,000, increased the city hospital, furnished it in every respect for blacks as for whites, and kind Sisters of Charity nursed at the bedside of the blacks, who lay on beds as pure as any white sufferers. They did these things and never thought they were doing anything extraordinary. Yet gentlemen come back here and tell us these are people who have no regard for human rights! It is a foul slander, and I brand it here as such. There is nothing in the majority report of the investigating committee upon Alabama affairs that is not totally and utterly false.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BROMBERG. I withdraw the motion.
